Johnson, contra. Supposing the objection arising from the agency of the slaves out of the way, the dealings fairly to be inferred from the evidence, consisted in sales of raw hides by Gore to Buzzard, and sales of tanned leather by Buzzard to Gore; for there is evidence, that Buzzard gave Gore credit for the value of the raw hides, and charged him with that of the tanned leather, in money; and that this account being rendered to Gore, he made no objection to the items of debit, but only claimed credits beyond what were allowed him, of which however, he never adduced any proof. And this evidence, moreover, suffices to prove a distinct admission by Gore, that the agency of his slaves in these dealings, was authorized by him; that his slaves received the tanned leather he wanted, which constituted the items of debit in the account, by his leave and consent, or rather by his express direction previously given to them. The authorized agency of Gore's slaves in his dealings with Buzzard, is also proved by the evidence of his dealing in that manner with two other tanners, and of his habit of dealing through the agency of his slaves,—of giving verbal directions to them to deliver his raw hides at the tannery, and to receive the tanned leather he wanted. The statute referred to, does not prohibit the receiving of goods from the owner by the hands of his slaves; nor does it require that the leave or consent of the owner to the dealings of his slaves, even on their own account, shall be in writing. The just inference from the evidence in this case, is, that Gore's slaves acted 235 *in these dealings by his directions and for him; in other words, by his leave and consent expressly and previously given: but, certainly, such leave and consent might have been implied from his subsequent conduct, without direct positive proof.

CARR, J. A demurrer to evidence is always a dangerous course; and here, I think it was particularly ill-advised. For the evidence stated in the demurrer, giving it only fair play, and drawing the inferences which a jury should reasonably have drawn from it, is quite sufficient to establish the appellee's claim to recover. The facts proved furnish the strongest grounds to infer, that for a series of years Gore was in the habit of getting his leather from Buzzard's tannery; that though his slaves were his agents, or rather his instruments, for carrying raw hides to the tanner, and bringing back tanned leather, yet it was he who sent the raw material and received the manufactured article; and that he was to pay the difference, if any, between the values of what he thus bought and sold. When Buzzard's administrators rendered the account, at Gore's instance, he examined it, and did not object to any of the charges against him; he only objected to the charge of interest, and said that if they would give him the credit she was entitled to, he would pay the principal. This was a plain admission of the justice of the account, except as to the interest, and as to the credits he claimed, which, however, he never attempted to prove; and this admission alone, affords a decisive answer to the whole argument for the appellant. The judgment of the circuit court is right.

The other judges concurred. Judgment affirmed.

Same v. Robertson.

February, 1837.

Escheat of Debtor's Land—Petition of Creditor—Affidavit—Evidence.—Upon a petition under the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 82, § 14 by the creditor of a person whose lands have been escheated, the creditor is required to make affidavit that the amount of his demand is bona fide due. but this requisition of the statute does not dispense with the necessity of other evidence: the court can only render judgment for such sum as is proved to be due.

Appellate Practice—Judgment for Whole Demand, When Whole Not Proved—Effect.—If judgment has been rendered for the whole amount of the demand, when the whole is not proved to be due, and it is uncertain to what part the proof extends, an appellate court will reverse the judgment and dismiss the petition.

Escheat of Debtor's Land—Right of Escheator to Plead Statute of Limitations.—The escheator who is defendant to the petition, has the same right to plead the statute of limitations in bar of the petition, that a representative of the debtor would have to plead the statute in bar of an action.

Same—Same—Exception.—Where, whether the exception in the statute of limitations, of accounts which concern the trade of merchandize between merchant and merchant, will apply to accounts, no item of which has arisen within five years.

Dealings between Merchant and Merchant—Statute of Limitations—Exception.—If the items of the lication to the plea of the statute of limitations, that the accounts concerned the trade of merchandize between merchant and merchant: no evidence is adduced to prove that either party was a merchant during the time of the dealings between them, nor any evidence of the character of those dealings but that furnished by the account of the petitioner: in which account, the debits to the alleged debtor, consisted of two items for cash paid him on account of bills of exchange, one item for goods sold him, and the other items for cash advanced to or for him, and there was a single credit for the proceeds of a bill of exchange bought of him: HELD, that the replication was not supported by the evidence, and the demand therefore was barred by the statute.

James Lyle administrator of James Lyle the elder deceased, who was the surviving partner of Lyle & M'Creddie, presented a petition to the county court of Albemarle, at August term 1821—shewing, that Robert Miller, a merchant of that county, was indebted to Lyle & M'Creddie, on an unsettled and running account, common among merchants, in the sum of 141 dollars, and died without settling the account, leaving no personal estate to pay the debt, but seized of a parcel of land in Albemarle, which had been regularly escheated to the commonwealth, by office found,* for want of heirs of the decedent, and had been sold by the escheator, who still held the proceeds of sale in his hands; and, therefore, praying, that Watson, the escheator, should be made defendant, and should be directed to pay the debt due the petitioner from the decedent, out of the proceeds of sale of the escheated land, according to the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 82, § 14, p. 297.*

237 In the account exhibited with the petition, the debits to Miller consisted of two items for cash paid him on account of bills of exchange, one item for goods sold him, and the other items for cash advanced to or for him; and there was a single credit, for the proceeds of a bill of exchange bought of him. And the first item in the account account between merchant and merchant are all on one side, the claim will not be within the reason or principle of the exception, which intended open and current accounts, where there were mutual dealings and mutual credits or debits. *Roots v. *The statute provides, that "When any person shall die indebted, seized of lands which shall become escheated to the commonwealth, not having personal property sufficient to pay such debts, the creditor may exhibit his petition before the court of the county or corporation, in which such escheat shall take place, or in the superior court of law for such county, making the escheator of such county or corporation a party defendant, who shall defend such claim; and the said court shall proceed to judgment according to the right of the case, and render the same for such sum as shall appear to be due to such petitioner, if any thing; and it shall be the duty of such escheator, on such judgment being rendered, to satisfy and pay the amount thereof, if the proceeds of the sale be sufficient, and yet in his hands; and if the same shall be paid into the treasury, the auditor shall, and is hereby required, on a copy of such judgment, properly authenticated, being filed, to issue a warrant; and the treasurer shall pay the amount, or so much as has been received on account of such sale: Provided, That the slaves and other personal estate shall be previously applied in the payment of the debts of the said decedent, and that every such creditor shall annex an affidavit to the said petition, stating that the amount of his or her demand is bona fide due and owing at the time of preferring the petition."—Note in Original Edition.

was dated in October 1803, and the last in August 1806.

At the same term of the county court, Robertson surviving partner of Bridges & Robertson, presented a petition to the court against Watson the escheator; exactly similar to that of Lyle's administrator, mutatis mutandis; in which he prayed, that the escheator should be directed to pay him a debt of 2837 dollars, being the balance due from Miller to Bridges & Robertson, on an unsettled running account between them.

238 *There were two accounts exhibited with the petition, in this case. The first was an account of dealing between Miller and Bridges & Robertson, commencing in July 1811, and ending in September 1814, at which time Miller died; and the credits to Miller consisted of one item for tobacco, and nine items of cash received from him, and the debits consisted of a few items for goods sold him, and numerous items of cash advanced to or for him. In the other account, raised between Miller's estate after his death and Bridges & Robertson, the first item was dated in October 1814, and the last in August 1816: and in this account, Miller's estate was charged with the balance due from him in his lifetime, and some other moneys which became due after his death, in consequence of dealings which commenced in his lifetime, and also with all the moneys disbursed for the estate, by Bridges who was Miller's administrator, as having been in fact disbursed by Bridges & Robertson; and the estate was credited with the moneys received by Bridges, the administrator, for Miller's estate; shewing the balance of 2837 dollars claimed in the petition, as due Bridges & Robertson. In the first of these accounts, there were seven charges, amounting to more than 1800 dollars, for advances by Bridges & Robertson to take up notes and acceptances of Miller; and, in the last, charges to the amount of 744 dollars, for a note of Miller for 698 dollars, with interest and charges of protest, paid by Bridges & Robertson after Miller's death.

The escheator pleaded the act of limitations, in both cases, to which the petitioners replied, that the accounts concerned the trade of merchandize between merchant and merchant.

In the case of Lyle's administrator, there was no evidence to prove, that either Lyle & M'Creddie, or Miller, during the time of the dealings between them, were merchants, and no other evidence of the character of the dealings between these parties, but that which the account furnished. In Robertson's case, there was proof, that from the year 1803, Miller was engaged, principally, as a merchant* in trade, and that, for some years previous to his death, he was engaged in speculations in the produce of the country, and in the manufacture of cotton cloth; but the only proof that the dealings between these parties, were dealings between them as merchant and merchant, was that furnished by the accounts.

Each of the petitioners verified the allegations of his petition by his own affidavit: each of them, moreover, adduced affidavits of witnesses to prove the justice of his claim.

The evidence of the claim of Lyle's administrator was quite sufficient.

The evidence of Robertson's claim consisted of the affidavit of a witness, proving, 1. That the witness had compared the accounts filed by the petitioner with the books of Bridges & Robertson, and found the greater part of them charged in the hand writing of one Scott, a clerk of the house (who had since gone to Scotland, and was reported to be dead), though the witness could not designate which of the items were in Scott's hand writing; and that a small part in the commencement of the account, was entered on the books in the hand writing of Triplett, another clerk of the house, who was now a resident of Kentucky. 2. That Bridges & Robertson did, within the knowledge of the witness, advance considerable sums of money for Miller, and that he died indebted to them to a large amount, besides the two notes filed in the cause. 3. That Bridges & Robertson paid one note of Miller, indorsed by them, for 200 dollars, due at the Farmers Bank on the 3rd September 1814. And 4. That Bridges, as Miller's administrator, after his death, took up another note of Miller for 698 dollars, by giving Bridges & Robertson's note for the same amount, which was charged to Miller's estate, in the second account of Bridges & Robertson filed in the cause.

It was proved, that Miller's personal estate was not sufficient to pay the claims of the petitioners or any part thereof. It appeared, that Miller died about the last of September 1814; and that his land in 240 *to the commonwealth, by inquest of office found the 9th August 1817.

Albemarle, was regularly escheated

In each of the cases, there was a case agreed, and order entered by consent, waiving all irregularities in pleading, and in the manner of taking the evidence, and submitting for the decision of the court, upon the evidence filed in each case,* the following points—1. Whether there was sufficient proof, that Miller did not leave sufficient personal estate to pay the debts claimed by the petitioners, respectively, or either of them? 2. Whether there was sufficient proof that the accounts of the petitioners, or either of them, were such accounts as concerned the trade of merchandize between merchant and merchant, within the meaning of the statute of limitations, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 4, p. 488? "there being no other evidence of the nature and character of the claims, respectively, except the face of the accounts, and the affidavits; though the original existence of Robertson's accounts, as it respected the negotiable notes, was not denied." 3. Whether, under the circumstances of these cases, the statute of limitations was pleadable in bar of the claims of the petitioners, or of either of them?

*The reporter states the cases, in this particular, as the president of the court seems to have understood them. As the reporter understands the records, each case (and especially Lyle's) was submitted upon the evidence filed in both, so as to make the evidence in each evidence in the other.
—Note in Original Edition.

and 4. Whether upon the whole case, judgment should be given for the petitioners, or either of them, or for the escheator?

The county court adjudged, in the case of Lyle's administrator, that the escheator should pay him 131 dollars, with interest thereon from the 1st September 1806, till paid, and his costs, out of the proceeds of Miller's land, in his hands; and, in Robertson's case, that the escheator should pay him 2837 dollars, with interest thereon from the 1st September 1816 till paid, and his costs, out of the proceeds of the escheated land, or so much thereof as should remain after satisfying the debt adjudged to 241 Lyle's administrator. *From these judgments, Watson the escheator appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed them; and then he appealed to this court.

The causes were argued here by the attorney general for the appellant, and by Taylor for the appellees.

I. The first question was, whether there was proof of Miller's personal estate being insufficient to pay the debts? But of this there was hardly room to doubt; and the court had no doubt.

II. The next question was, whether the debts claimed by the appellees, respectively, were proved?

There was no doubt, that that claimed by Lyle's administrator, was proved. But, as to the debt claimed by Robertson, the attorney general said, that (excepting the two notes for 200 dollars and 698 dollars) the evidence was too vague to prove any thing. The witness said that the greater part of the items were entered in the hand writing of one clerk, but instantly contradicted himself by admitting that he could not designate the items entered by him, and that a small part were entered in the hand writing of another clerk; so that it was impossible to understand which were the items, to which the proof of entry in the hand writing of the clerks, applied.

Taylor answered, that the claim of the creditor was verified by his own affidavit; which was all that the statute in such cases required. Then, there was the affidavit of the witness, the obvious meaning of which was, that all the items were charged in the hand writing of the two clerks, the greater part in that of one, and a small part in that of the other; and when he said, that he could not designate which of the items were charged in the hand writing of Scott, his meaning was, that, though he had examined the books, and found the greater part of the items charged in Scott's hand writing, yet, not having the books, but only the copy of the accounts filed in the cause, before him, at the time of his affidavit, he could not then designate the 242 items entered by *Scott. There were charges in the two accounts, for notes and acceptances of Miller taken up by Bridges & Robertson, to the amount of more than 2500 dollars; the original existence of which (it was expressly stated in the case agreed) was not denied; and surely this fact, coupled with the other evidence, was enough to prove a debt to as large an amount as that which the county court adjudged to this creditor. At all events, the claim was proved to the amount of the notes and acceptances; and if the judgment was wrong in giving the whole balance claimed, this court, proceeding to give the judgment which the court below ought to have given, ought to give judgment for the amount that was proved. Besides, the eachedor did not contest the original justice of the claim; he rested his defence wholly on the statute of limitations.

The attorney general replied, that the last point submitted to the court by the case agreed (namely, whether judgment ought to be given for the petitioners, or for the defendant) presented the question whether there was sufficient proof of the claim.

III. The third point was, whether these were accounts concerning the trade of merchandize between merchant and merchant, within the meaning of the exception in the statute of limitations?

The attorney general argued, 1st, As to the case of Lyle's administrator, that it was well settled, that the exception in the statute applies only to open, current accounts, not to stated accounts, or to notes or bills. 2 Wms. Saund. 127, note 6; Ramchander v. Hammond, 2 Johns. Rep. 200. The account of Lyle & M'Creddie was not an open, current account; the debits were very few, and there was only a single credit, and that for the proceeds of a bill of exchange; and the last item was dated as early as 1806. The dealings then ceased, and the account was closed; it was thenceforth, in effect, a stated account; and the statute of limitations began to run. Besides, there is no evidence in the case of Lyle's administrator, that Miller, 243 the debtor, *was a merchant; nor is there any thing in his dealings with Lyle & M'Creddie at all peculiar to mercantile business. 2ndly, In Robertson's case, the last account (that raised between Miller's estate after his death, and Bridges & Robertson) certainly was not an account between merchant and merchant. And in the preceding account, of dealings during Miller's lifetime, many of the largest debits were charges of notes and acceptances of Miller, taken up by Bridges & Robertson, all of which constituted liquidated demands.

Taylor answered, 1st, That the account on which the claim of Lyle's administrator was founded, was not the less an open or current account, because the dealings had ceased: the distinction was between open or current accounts and stated accounts: stated accounts were such accounts only as have been, in some way or other, settled between the parties; all other accounts were open or current accounts. It was true there was no evidence filed by Lyle's administrator, to prove that Miller was a merchant; but the fact was proved by the evidence filed in Robertson's case; and by the case agreed in Lyle's case, the evidence in Robertson's was made evidence in Lyle's also. Here, then, were dealings between merchants; one party advancing cash to the other, and not buying, but taking, a bill of exchange from him, the proceeds of which when received were to be put to his credit. This transaction was, in its character, peculiarly mercantile. 2ndly, The account of Bridges

& Robertson with Miller in his lifetime, was plainly an account between merchant and merchant, unless the advances of cash by merchant to merchant in a course of dealing were contrary to the mercantile character of the transaction; which he thought it impossible to maintain. The charges for Miller's notes and acceptances, were not for his notes and acceptances to Bridges & Robertson, but for cash advanced by them to take up his notes and acceptances to others. But, he insisted, the act of limitations could, in no view, be a bar to Robertson's claim. The oldest item in the 244 *first account of Bridges & Robertson was dated in 1811; and Miller died in 1814, that is, within five years; so that there was, then, no bar to a claim against Miller's administrator, and he appropriated Miller's assets to it. Upon that first account, and upon the second account raised after Miller's death, no claim could be asserted for payment out of the proceeds of his land, till the land was escheated and sold, and the proceeds in the eachedor's hands. Therefore, the statute of limitations could not begin to run for the eachedor, until the escheat, which took place in 1817; and Robertson's petition was filed within five years after, namely, in 1821. The uniting of the two claims, on the account against Miller in his lifetime, and that against Miller's estate, was not improper in this case; for the statute, which gave this summary proceeding by petition, directed that the court should proceed to judgment according to the right of the case; a phrase always used in our statutes, to dispense with technical forms.

IV. The attorney general contended, that the escheator might properly avail himself of the statute of limitations in his defence. The statute which gave the remedy against him, directed, in general terms, that he should defend the claims; and thus authorized and required him to make any and every defence which might affect the legal justice of the claims. The escheator, in effect, represented the estate of the deceased debtor; for, notwithstanding the escheat and sale of the land, if any heir of the decedent should afterwards appear within ten years, and prove his right, he would be entitled to the net proceeds of the sale, by the new provision of the statute, enacted in 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 82, § 19, p. 298.

Taylor answered, that the escheator represented the commonwealth, and as the statute of limitations did not run against her, so neither was it an available defence for her. The provision of the statute which gave the remedy against the escheator, was enacted in 1804: Sess. Acts of 1803-4, ch.

77, § 3. Before that statute, the creditors of a decedent *whose lands had 245 escheated to the commonwealth, always applied by petition to the legislature, for payment of their debts, out of the proceeds of the escheated lands; and if an heir appeared after the opportunity for asserting his rights at law had gone by, he also applied by petition to the legislature, for the money. They were both applications to the equity of the government. If the creditor proved his debt, it never was heard that the legislature rejected his petition, because he had not come within the time of limitation of actions; and in reference to the possible future claim of an heir, it never was imagined, that he had a better claim on the equity of the government, than a creditor whose claim was just, though it had not been asserted within the statute of limitations. The only object both of the statute of 1803-4, which gave the remedy to the creditor against the escheator, and of the new provision of 1819, which gave the remedy for the heir, if one should appear, was, to provide a judicial remedy, in place of the petition to the legislature; and the intent was, that justice should be administered by the courts upon the same principles on which it had always been administered by the legislature. The legislature never intended, that the escheator might avail himself of the defence of the statute of limitations, to which it had never paid the least respect in its dispensations of equity, in such cases; that the escheator might avail himself of that statute, which the debtor himself might never have chosen to plead. And, he said, the statute of limitations had never been held an available defence for any one but the debtor himself or his representatives. Upon this principle, in England, though none but a creditor can sue out a commission of bankruptcy, it was no objection to the commission, that the claim of the petitioning creditor was more than six years old; Quantock &c. v. England, 5 Burr. 2068; Mavor &c. v. Pine, 2 Carr. & Payne, 91, 12 Eng. C. L. R. 41. But if the statute of limitations was an available defence for the escheator, from what time did the statute run in respect to him? Certainly, only from the time when the proceeds of the escheated land

246 *came to his hands, since, until then, the creditors could institute no judicial proceeding. Otherwise, if the escheat was delayed (as was very often the case) for more than five years after the decedent's death, the remedy of every creditor by simple contract would be barred. The creditors, in the present cases, being simple contract creditors, they had no claim for satisfaction out of their deceased debtor's land. Their right, as well as their remedy, to get satisfaction out of the land, was given by the statute; and, by the statute, neither the right nor the remedy accrued till the proceeds of the escheated land had been collected by the escheator. Both of the creditors in these cases, resorted to their remedy within five years after the escheat; and, therefore, the defence of the statute of limitations failed as to both.

TUCKER, P. The claims of the petitioning creditors to have satisfaction out of the proceeds of the escheated lands, are resisted on two grounds—that the debts are not proved; and that the claims are barred by the statute of limitations.

1st, As to Lyle's case, the court holds that the debt is sufficiently proved; and the only questions in that case are those which arise out of the plea of the statute of limitations. To the defence founded on the statute, two answers have been given: 1. that the escheator as representing the commonwealth, cannot plead the statute; and 2. that the account is between merchant and merchant, and not within the bar of the statute.

In deciding the first of these questions, I do not think it necessary to examine, generally, whether the commonwealth is within the statute of limitations. I incline to think she is not. But, in this case, the statute has constituted the escheator the defendant in the action, and has directed that he shall defend the suit. That defence is not against a claim exhibited against the commonwealth, but against the estate of a decedent, escheated to the state, which the liberal spirit of our laws permits to be charged with any just demands against that decedent. Of these claims the com-247 monwealth *and her officers have, and can have, no personal knowledge.

Whether they were just in their origin, or have been paid, may be, and in the nature of the thing, must usually be, unknown to them; and if paid, it may be out of their power to furnish the evidence, either oral or documentary, to establish the payment. The papers of the decedent do not fall into the hands of the escheator; and where he leaves no heirs and no personal estate, there is no one on whom the duty would devolve, of preserving the vouchers which might prove the satisfaction of a demand. Cases like this call most loudly for the protection of the statute against stale and antiquated claims; and if there be any instance, in which we are to make a practical application of the principle, that cases within the mischiefs of a statute, are to be regarded as embraced by its provisions, that instance is afforded here. The petition, indeed, is not one of the actions designated in the statute; but it is precisely analogous to the action of assumpsit upon a merchant's account; and in the same spirit in which a court of equity regards the statute as running against a bill, though bills are not mentioned in the statute, a court of law ought to regard it as running against this petition; which is, in effect, an action to recover the amount of an open account. The object of the statute was to limit stale demands of certain descriptions (accounts among others) whatever might be the nature of the suit instituted for their recovery.

It is said, indeed, that no one can plead the statute of limitations, but a party to the transaction, and cases under the bankrupt laws in England, have been cited to sustain the position. It is unimportant to examine those cases here. Nothing is better established, than that where an executor declines, as he may do in his discretion, to plead the statute, a creditor of the estate may, nevertheless, insist upon it before the master; Ex parte Dewdney, 15 Ves. 498. It would be strange indeed, if it were otherwise; for when there is likely to be a deficiency of assets, those who are interested in them ought to be at liberty to protect them by *every legal defence.

So here, the commonwealth, having liberally admitted demands upon the land, it is at least reasonable that those demands should be clearly established, and that she should be permitted, through her escheator, to protect the estate from unjust claims, by the same defences the decedent's administrator would have had. Or, considering her in the light of an heir or mortgagor, against whom a simple contract creditor seeks to marshal the assets, she would be entitled through her officer to the defence of the statute. So, if before this statute, the lands of a mortgagor had escheated to the commonwealth, and the mortgagee being paid out of the personalty, the simple contract creditors had sought to charge the land, there can, I think, be no doubt that the commonwealth, standing in the shoes of the mortgagor, would have a right to the defence of the statute of limitations. But the case here, is infinitely stronger. The commonwealth, through her officer, is here, in part, in a fiduciary character. By her law, notwithstanding the escheat and sale of the land, and the payment of the proceeds into the treasury, any person shewing title to the land may at any time within ten years assert his claim; and if it be established, shall be entitled to receive the net proceeds of the purchase money. The commonwealth, then, stands here as the representative of the estate. The defences of the estate, by her officer, are indeed, in the first instance, defences of her own right, but they may peradventure turn out to be defences of the rights of some unknown heir. She must, therefore, be looked on as to these defences, as defending for the heir, and as entitled to plead what an heir might rely on, who was resisting an attempt to charge his land with a simple contract debt, by a bill to marshal assets. I am therefore of opinion, that the plea of the statute of limitations was an available plea in this case, unless the appellees can bring themselves within the exceptions of the statute.

This is attempted by replying, that the account is an account between merchant and merchant concerning the trade
249 *of merchandize; and the influence of this replication is resisted on two grounds (in the case of Lyle's administrator). 1st, It is said, that cases of notes and bills are not within the exception. But this is not an action upon a bill or note; the bill was sold by Miller, and the full amount being credited, it must be presumed to have been paid. There is then no demand upon the bill. The demand is for the excess of the account above the bill. 2ndly, It is said, this is an account stated or closed in 1806. But, though the dealings then ceased, the account is not for that reason an account stated. An account stated is where the accounts between the parties have been either actually settled, or are presumed to be so from the circumstance of a party's retaining, for a long time, without objection, the account of the other party, which has been presented to him, shewing a balance against him. By the settlement (or implied admission which is considered equivalent) it has become an ascertained debt. All intricacy of account, or doubt as to which side the balance may fall, is at an end; and thus the case is neither within the letter nor the spirit of the exception. 2 Wms. Saund. 127, d. e. note 7; Freeland v. Heron &c., 7 Cranch, 147. The cases have indeed been contradictory as to the question, whether open accounts are or are not barred

(though they be between merchant and merchant) where the last item is above five years standing. Chancellor Kent is in favor of the bar in such cases; Carter v. Murray, 5 Johns. C. R. 522, and a like opinion is intimated in Jones v. Pengree, 6 Ves. 580; Duff v. East India Co., 15 Ves. 198; Barber v. Barber, 18 Ves. 286. Yet in Foster v. Hodgson, 19 Ves. 179, 185, the whole matter seems to be again unsettled in England. But in Mandeville v. Willson, 5 Cranch, 15, the supreme court was clearly of opinion, that it is not necessary that any of the items, in the case of merchant's accounts, should come within the five years. This is, I think, the reasonable doctrine; for otherwise, there is no perceivable difference between merchants' accounts and others; since, even be-

250 tween *common persons, if there be items within five years, the statute does not bar. See also Catling v. Skoulding, 6 T. R. 189, 192.

In Lyle's case, then, I do not think the bar would apply strictly as such, if the replication were true. But what evidence is there in this case, that the account concerned the trade of merchandize between merchant and merchant? Absolutely none. There is no proof that the parties were merchants; and the account contains no charge of merchandize.* In this case, then, the bar, I conceive, is complete.

Then, 2ndly. As to Robertson's case. This, though less exposed to the objection of the staleness of the demand, is yet more fundamentally defective than the other. Its defects are in the proofs of the demand, and the nature of the claims. The proof of the demand is altogether defective, because it is certain that the whole account is not proved, and it is uncertain to what part, or to what amount, the proof extends. The witness swears, that the greater part of the items were charged by Scott, and that a small part was charged by Triplett; of the rest there is no proof. Can we divine what items were entered by these two clerks? Or can we ascertain, from this vague testimony, how much their charges will amount to in the aggregate? It is impossible. If so, then it may be that the very entries made by these witnesses may have been those which related to the bills and notes, and which may, therefore, probably be unprotected by the exception in the statute; or those which were made after the intestate's death, which for other reasons may be objected to. And, moreover, as the aggregate amount of what was entered by those clerks is not proved, it is not perceived how the sum could be ascertained for which the judgment should have been entered. Accordingly, we find, the court, being unable to distinguish, gave a judgment for the whole account, whereas 251 it is very *clear that the whole account was not proved. I am, therefore, of opinion, that in this case also the judgment is erroneous.

Believing it possible that something may be due in Robertson's case, I have reflected upon the practicability of sending the cause back for further proceedings. But as the case is at law and not in equity, I do not see how it can be done. The parties have put their rights upon this issue and this evidence; and they must abide it.

Judgments reversed in both cases, and petitions dismissed.

*Elder v. Elder's Ex'or.

February, 1833.

Slaves—Emancipation—Election—Case at Bar.—Testator bequeathed, that his negro woman C. and her child A. and C.'s increase be given to G. D. in trust to be sent to the colony of Liberia, provided the expense of sending them would be defrayed by the colonization society; and that the rest of his negroes who might be willing to go, should also be left in trust to said G. D. to be sent to Liberia in same manner; but that those who should prefer to stay here, should be given, within twelve months, to his brother. Testator's estate being involved in debts, which the other personal assets did not suffice to pay, the executor hired out the slaves for several years, to raise a fund out the profits to pay debts: HELD.

1. Same—Same—Necessity for Election in Prescribed Time.—This was an effectual emancipation of such of the slaves as preferred to go to Liberia; and it was not necessary to perfect their title to freedom, that they should elect to go within the year, provided they made such election when it was offered to them,—or that the colonization society should agree to defray the expense of sending them, provided any person would agree to do so.

2. Same—Same—Effect as to Those Born after Death of Testator.—The slaves born after the testator's death and while the executor held their mothers in slavery, were also emancipated.

3. Same—Same—Right of the Mother to Elect for Infant.—As to the infant slaves incapable to make election for themselves, it was right to take the election of their mothers for them.

4. Same—Right of Executor to Hire Out to Pay Debts.—The executor did right in hiring the slaves out, in order to raise a fund out of their profits to pay testator's debts, and consequently in forbearing to offer the slaves their election to go to Liberia within the year; for.

5. Same—Emancipation—Right of Executor to Refunding Bond.—When slaves emancipated by will, are set free by the executor, he is not entitled to a refunding bond to indemnify him against the claims of the testator's creditors, though the manumitted slaves are, notwithstanding manumission, subject to debts; and,

6. Debts of Testator—Liability of Freed Men.—The burden of debts ought to be distributed among such freed men as equally as practicable.

Herbert Elder, late of Petersburg, died in June 1826, having by his last will and testament, after directing that all his debts should be paid, and bequeathing some trivial legacies, bequeathed and provided as follows: "It is my will that my negro woman Clara, and her child Ann Eliza, and Clara's increase, be given to Gabriel Dissosway, in trust to be sent to Africa to the colony at Liberia, provided the expense of sending them will be defrayed by the colonization society—And it is my further will, that the remaining part of my negroes who may be willing to go, shall be left in trust to the said Gabriel Dissosway, 253 to be sent to the colony *at Liberia, in the same manner as Clara and her increase—Those of them who prefer staying, shall be given, within the space of twelve months after my decease, to my brother John Elder and his heirs forever—And it is further my will and desire, that all my remaining property not mentioned or disposed of in the above items, shall be given to my brother John Elder and his heirs forever—Lastly, I appoint my friend Minton Thrift executor of this my last will and testament." Thrift qualified as the executor in the hustings court of Petersburg at July term 1826.

In March 1828, the residuary legatee exhibited his bill in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, against Thrift the executor, and Dissosway the trustee,—setting forth the will of his brother: charging, that the debts of the testator were few and trivial, and his other personal estate besides slaves, was much more than enough to pay them; that the slaves conditionally emancipated by the will, had never elected to go to Liberia; but that, on the contrary, the executor having fully explained the will to them, and their rights under it, they had declared they would not go to Liberia, and preferred to remain in Virginia in slavery; and that they had remained here for near two years since the testator's death: claiming the slaves, therefore, as the property of the plaintiff: and praying an account of Thrift's administration, a decree for the slaves and their increase, and for the surplus of the assets.

Thrift answered, that the testator died much indebted; that he had in vain exerted himself to collect the assets, and pay the debts, within the year after his testator's death; that some debts were still due, and known to be so, and others were claimed but contested; that the slaves, being liable for the debts, which the other personal estate should prove inadequate to pay, and being unable to give the executor a bond to make good the debts for which they might be held liable, and the executor thinking the sale of any of the slaves to raise a fund to pay the debts, would have been an injustice toward them, he had, therefore, hitherto continued

254 *to hold them all, and hire them out, to raise a sufficient fund for debts from the profits, and this with the approbation of the trustee Dissosway; that, under these circumstances, he had not yet given the slaves their election, to go to Liberia or remain in slavery in Virginia, though he had explained their rights to them under his testator's will, and he did not doubt, that when they should be allowed to make their election, they would prefer to go to Liberia, rather than remain the slaves of the plaintiff in Virginia.

The chancellor by consent of parties, ordered an account of the executor's administration, and appointed five gentlemen of Petersburg, or any three of them, commissioners, to examine, privily and impartially, all the slaves of the testator's estate, and to ascertain from each individual, and report to the court, whether he or she was willing to go to Liberia.

The accounts of the executor's administration were reported in 1829, shewing that he had been fairly administering the estate during the interval since the testator's death; that there was a balance of 92 dollars due from the executor to the estate at the end of the year 1828; that the administration was not completed, there being yet some debts due the estate to collect, and some claimed from it which were not yet liquidated; and that the executor had hired out the slaves for the year 1829, on condition that they should be returned to him at any time during the year, when called for, to be sent to Liberia.

The commissioners returned a list of the slaves (other than Clara and her children) specifying their names, sexes and ages; that there were fourteen of them; of whom eight were under age of twenty-one years, six between fourteen and twenty, one six, and one two years of age: and that they had examined them according to the directions contained in the order of the court; that upon that examination, the terms of the testator Herbert Elder's will being fully explained to them, one of them named Mingo refused to accept his freedom on the terms proposed, but all the rest 255 *declared, that they preferred to accept their freedom and go to Liberia; that, however, in respect to the two infants of six and two years of age, who were incapable of determining for themselves, they had considered it their duty to take the election of their mother for them, as their election.

And the defendant filed a document in the cause, in these words: "Office of the colonization society, Washington, December 23, 1829. At a meeting of the board of managers of the american colonization society, June 11th 1826, the following resolution was adopted—Resolved, that the resident agent state, in reply to the letter of Mr. Dissosway, that the society with pleasure accept the late Herbert Elder's slaves on the terms proposed in his will, and will transport the persons left by him as soon as they can prepare an expedition—Teste R. R. Gurley, secretary."

The plaintiff excepted to this document, as evidence; which exception was overruled. And the court directed the commissioner to state and report the sequel of the executor Thrift's accounts of administration.

The commissioner reported the executor's accounts to the end of the year 1830, shewing a balance in his hands, principal and interest, of 454 dollars, which consisted entirely of the hires of the slaves for the years 1829 and 1830, and that the administration was not yet quite completed.

In this state of the cause, it was transferred to the circuit superior court of law and chancery of Petersburg; and that court, upon a hearing in November 1831, decreed, that the executor Thrift should deliver to the plaintiff, the slave Mingo who had elected not to go to Liberia, upon the plaintiff giving bond to the executor, if required by him, in the penalty of 250 dollars, with condition to refund in case the assets should be necessary for debts of the testator; and that he should deliver to the defendant Dissosway all the other slaves of the testator, upon his giving bond to the executor, if required by him, in the penalty of 4000 dollars, with like condition to refund if the assets should be necessary 256 *for debts. And the court directed accounts of the sequel of the executor's administration, till it should be completed.

From this decree the plaintiff John Elder, by petition to this court, prayed an appeal; which was allowed.

Spooner and Taylor, for the appellant.
W. M. Atkinson and Stanard, for the appellee.

CARR, J. In the construction of wills, we are to find out the meaning, the intention, the will, of the testator; and unless that violates some principle of law, it must be carried into execution. To my mind it is just as clear as any form of words could make it, that this testator wished, that all his slaves should be given up to Dissosway, to be transported to Liberia, there to be free, if the colonization society would pay the expenses of removal; unless any of them should prefer to stay here and be slaves—and such (he willed) should be the slaves of his brother, the appellant. I do not believe he had an idea of making their election within twelve months, a condition, which, under all circumstances, should be strictly performed, and on failure of which they should be the slaves of his brother. He thought it probable, I suppose, that the choice would be submitted to them within the twelve months; and meant, that all who, upon such submission, should express a preference for remaining, should thereupon be handed over to his brother. The executor has explained this matter fully. He certainly had, for the creditors, the paramount right of assenting or not to this bequest, and of saying when he could with safety assent. He tells us, that he found the state of the debts such, that he could not discharge them without selling some of the negroes, or hiring them out. He very properly preferred the latter; and this making delay inevitable, he did not think it proper to submit to them, at once, the question of election. In the meantime, the appellant filed this bill—and then the subject being before the court, the 257 chancellor very properly *appointed commissioners to examine the negroes. Those commissioners have reported, that all but one have elected to go to Liberia; that two of them were too young (one being six and the other two years old) to make a choice; and that in these cases, they had taken the choice of their mothers. In this, I think, they acted very properly. It is certain, that the testator did not, on account of their infancy, intend to condemn them to unconditional slavery; and who so proper to decide for them as their mother?

It was said, that the children born since the testator's death must be slaves, because their mothers were so at their birth. But admitting the fact, the consequence does not seem to follow: for the testator willed, that all the rest of his slaves shall be given to Dissosway, to be taken to Liberia.

Now, if these children were born slaves, they were the slaves of the testator, and come within the bequest as well as their mothers. It is not worth while then to inquire whether they were born free or not.

It was also said, there is no evidence of the willingness or the ability of the society, to pay the expense of transportation. I think there is such evidence of willingness as justifies the decree; and as to the ability, the testator required no guaranty for that.

With respect to the hires, I do not think that a question before us. This is an appeal from an interlocutory decree, and in such cases, we have often said, that the appeal is only from what the chancellor has done, not from such parts of the case as he has not yet acted upon—as to these, when the cause goes back, he may make such decree as all parties will be satisfied with. At any rate, he has as yet done nothing with respect to the profits, which can be appealed from.

It is objected by the appellee's counsel, that the chancellor ought not to have required that Dissosway should give bond to refund, if debts should afterwards come against the estate. I had thought, at first, that this point was not before us, as the appeal was taken by the other party; but, upon 258 *reflection, I think we ought to take notice of it; for it is a requisition which vitally affects the negroes, since the failure to give the bond, would frustrate the intention of the testator as to their freedom, and they being no parties to this proceeding, could not appeal from it; nor could their trustee do so, as he has never been before the court; and the executor would not appeal from it, for it is in his favor. It seems incumbent on us, therefore, to see whether the decree is right in this respect.

When a testator wills freedom to his slaves, it is, as a general rule, clearly not in the executor's power to demand a refunding bond: for who is to give it? Nobody; and thus the will might always be frustrated. The law shews that this is so, by giving to the creditors a resort to the slaves themselves, in case of defect of assets. The executor, too, if he finds the existing state of the debts demands it, may retain them, and hire them out, till he has raised a sufficient fund to pay the debts; and this, more especially in the case before us, where they are by the directions of the will to be removed beyond the reach of after claims. But even here, I do not think he can demand, or the court direct, that Dissosway shall give a refunding bond. The testator as he never meant to give Dissosway any beneficiary interest in the slaves, as little intended to subject him to any loss or risk; and, if he had so intended, could impose on him no such obligation. The direction, then, that the slaves shall be given to Dissosway, to be sent to Liberia, gives no more right to the executor to demand security, than if they had been set free at once. And of this the executor seems fully sensible; for in his answer, he says, that while his anxious desire to further the benevolent intentions of his testator, and his conviction that no one would give the usual refunding bond, if he let the slaves go to Africa, induced him to determine to dispense with that bond, from those who should go thither, yet ordinary prudence forbade his doing so, at least until all the claims that he had notice of against the estate, were settled.

Accordingly, he has hired them out, 259 *until we find, that, after paying the demands against the estate, he had at the last settlement, which was brought down to the 31st December 1830, a balance of 449 dollars in his hands; and there being two years hires of the negroes since, he must have now upwards of 1000 dollars, beyond all known claims on the estate. In this state of things, it was clearly wrong, I think, to put it in his power to demand of Dissosway an indemnifying bond in the penalty of 4000 dollars. This would, in all probability, wholly defeat the will. While the fund now in his hands, shall remain with the executor, it surely furnishes ample security against outstanding debts; and when, upon a final hearing, it shall be disposed of, as it probably will be according to the principles established in Paup v. Mingo, (ante, p. 163,) the court will not suffer it to be taken from him, without requiring of the person to whom it shall be decreed, bond and security to refund. I think, then, so much of the decree as requires this bond of Dissosway, if the executor chooses to demand it, is wrong, and should be corrected.

It was urged, that we ought now to take precautions, and make provisions insuring the due execution of that part of the will, which looks to the transporting these persons to Liberia; that we ought to require bond and surety for carrying them, or to pronounce that unless transported within a reasonable time, they should be given up to the appellant as his property. I do not think we are called on, at this time, to take any such step. It would be premature, and might operate injuriously and unjustly. We cannot possibly foresee, what circumstances may occur, or how they may influence, the question hereafter. All that we can safely do now, is to direct the circuit court, to which we shall send back this interlocutory decree, to reserve to the parties, liberty to resort to the court for its further aid, if at any future time such aid, in their opinion, shall become necessary for the due execution of the testator's will. Under such leave, if the appellant shall find that the transportation of the negroes is not likely to take place, or is unrea- 260 sonably *delayed, he may bring the subject before the court, and that which cannot now be foreseen, may then be decided, upon the actual circumstances of the case.

CABELL, J. The intention of the testator to emancipate his slaves, is too evident to require argument; and it is equally clear, that there is nothing illegal in the mode which he has adopted, for the execution of that intention. Slaves may be emancipated by deed or will, at the pleasure of their owners: but they forfeit their freedom unless they remove, within twelve months, beyond the limits of the commonwealth. It can, therefore, be no objection to the emancipation, in this case, that the testator has directed it on the condition of their willingness to go to Liberia.

As to the objection that Dissosway, the trustee, may fail to perform, or may violate, the trust, there is no reason to suspect such violation. The testator who knew him, has confided to him the execution of his benevolent intentions; and we ought not to deprive him of all power to execute them, on the mere allegation that he may, possibly, act improperly.

The will imposed no obligation on the slaves to express their willingness to go to Liberia, until they were properly called on to make their election. If the residuary legatee wished to avail himself of the rights which would accrue to him, on their refusal to go to Liberia, it was his duty to take measures for compelling them to make their election.

I approve of the principle declared by this court, in the case of Isaac v. West, 6 Rand. 652, that every instrument conferring freedom, should be construed liberally, in favor of liberty. And under the influence of this principle, I am of opinion, that, even if the colonization society should be unable or unwilling, to transport these people to Liberia, they would still be entitled to their freedom, provided any other person would furnish the means of sending them there. The testator did not mean to burden his estate with this expense; but he cared not who else might bear it.

261 *I think the children born since the death of the testator, are entitled to their freedom, equally with their mothers. If the mothers, are to be considered, by relation, as free from the death of the testator, then the children, following the condition of the mothers, were free at their birth—or, if the children were born slaves, they were the slaves of the testator, and, as such, they passed by the will, with their mothers, to be sent to Liberia.

It is not to be believed, that this benevolent testator, in emancipating the mothers, intended to separate from them their infant children, and to consign them to slavery. He intended that the election of the mothers should decide the destiny of their infant offspring.

But the decree is erroneous in the particulars mentioned by my brother Carr, and I concur in the correction of it proposed by him.

BROOKE, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. The first questions in this case, turn upon the intention of the testator and the legality of that intention. Of the intention, I think, there can be no reasonable doubt. It has become a matter of history that a colony has been established at Liberia for the reception of emancipated slaves, and that slavery is there unknown. The testator, in reference to this well known state of things, devises his slaves to a trustee, for the purpose of being sent to that colony. If his will be executed in terms, they must be free; and it is therefore equivalent, to say that he willed that they should be free. However, or by whatever words, the intention is expressed, that intention must prevail; for there is no prescribed form in which the benevolent design to emancipate a slave is required to be expressed. As little doubt exists of the legality of this intention. The slaves were not to be free until they should be sent to Liberia; and they were not to be sent there against their consent. It is not perceived, that there is anything in the policy of 262 the *law, as there certainly is not in its statutory provisions, which forbids an emancipation by transportation to a free colony.

That such transportation will necessarily operate as an emancipation, has been questioned in the argument, because the slaves may be brought back to Virginia, and then upon the principle decided by lord Stowell in the case of The mongrel woman Grace, they will be slaves again. But this argument is refuted by two considerations: 1, that bringing them back by force or against their will, would not restore them to their original status; for it is the voluntary return to their own country in slavery, from which it is implied, that the original status was not changed during their residence in a land where slavery is unknown: and 2. to bring them back again into slavery, would be directly to frustrate the testator's will, that they should be free, and is therefore not an admissible supposition.

It was next contended, that the gift of freedom by this will, depends upon the performance of two precedent conditions, with which that gift has been clogged; namely, that they shall make their election in the space of a year, and that the expense of transportation shall be paid by the colonization society. As to the first, the phraseology of the will is not exactly what the argument supposes. It is, as to the remaining slaves besides Clara and her family, as follows: "Those who are willing to go shall be sent to Liberia; those who prefer staying, shall be given, within twelve months after my decease, to my brother John Elder." By this clause, it was argued, the testator intended to create a condition, and that his slaves should only be free on condition. But what was that condition? It was that they should be willing to be transported. But, surely, there is nothing from which we can infer, that the time of declaration of their willingness, was of the essence of the condition. Contemplating that the affairs of his estate would speedily admit of the execution of this bequest, desirous to hasten that execution, on the one hand, and to pass over the property at once to his brother, on the other, if they should refuse to 263 go, he *fixes on the twelve months, as the probable time when they should be delivered to him. If the affairs of the estate should unexpectedly prevent an assent of the executor to this bequest of freedom within the year, or if the slaves should have been kept in ignorance of his benevolent intentions, until the year had gone by, can we believe, for a moment, that it was his design that they should lose their right to the boon he bequeathed to them? I think not. But this is not all. The will does not say they must elect within the year. It declares, that those who prefer to stay shall be given within twelve months after his death, to his brother. The question then would be, have any preferred to stay within the twelve months; and if not, then the gift over cannot take effect, if we are to give this rigorous construction to the clause. But the truth is, such a construction is incompatible with a fair view of the testator's designs; of the nature of the case; and of the character of the beneficiaries. They were ignorant slaves: they could not be free without the executor's assent, and the great object of their master was to effect their liberation, as soon as it was probable that assent could be safely given. Whenever the executor was prepared to assent to this legacy of freedom, the testator gave them a choice: that choice implied that the proposition should be submitted to them; submitted by that individual (the executor) who still held them in his hands. Until that was done, they were not, I conceive, called upon to declare, whether they were willing to go, or preferred to stay. I, therefore, think there is no obstacle to the execution of the will in their favor, arising out of the delay. Then, as to the provision, that the expenses should be defrayed by the colonization society. There is no assignable reason for supposing the testator made it a sine qua non, that that society should pay the expenses. His object was merely to provide that his estate should not be charged with them. But be this as it may, the case is not that of a bill by the slaves, to carry the trust into execution, in which they would have to prove that the society or some other 264 *person was ready to incur the charge; but it is a bill by Elder, to reduce them to slavery, in which the onus would be upon him to shew, that the society had refused to defray the expenses; for that is easily proved, if it be true. I think, therefore, there is nothing in this objection.

As to the increase born since the testator's death, they were born slaves, as their mothers are yet slaves; but they fall as fully as their mothers, within the general expression, "the rest of my negroes," and of course are equally the objects of the trust. How their election shall be ascertained has been a subject of difficulty. In these anomalous cases respecting slaves, we must be guided by reason and good sense, in the absence both of authority and analogy. The course which was taken in the court below, seems to me both natural and judicious, and is therefore approved.

As to the hires: these must be brought into the account of the estates. I cannot distinguish this case from Paup v. Mingo. Dissosway was a mere trustee, and takes nothing but in that character. He is, therefore, not entitled to the hires; nor are the slaves or the executor so entitled.

Upon the whole, I think the decree is right in all substantial points; though I do not concur in the correction of its details proposed by the other judges. I should have preferred a decree, directing the circuit court, to limit some reasonable time, within which the trustee Dissosway (or in case of his refusal or failure to execute the trust, such other fit person as may be willing to execute the same, to be appointed by the court) shall proceed to transport the slaves, who assent to be transported, to Liberia, agreeably to the directions of the will; and to require from Dissosway (or such other trustee) bond with surety in an adequate penalty, with condition, either to execute the trust to the best of his ability within the time so limited, or to deliver the slaves (deaths and accidents excepted) to the appellant as his property. I concur in the opinion of the other judges, that the circuit court erred in requiring the refunding bond, which in cases of emancipation, cannot properly be demanded; and that liberty should be reserved to the parties, to resort to the court, at any time hereafter, for its aid, in any future event which may render it necessary and proper.

The decree entered by the court, declared, that there was no error in so much of the decree, as directed the executor to deliver the slave Mingo to the appellant, on the terms therein stated, and to deliver the other slaves to Dissosway, to be by him sent to Liberia; but that so much of the decree as suspended the delivery of these slaves to Dissosway, till he should give bond and security in the penalty of 4000 dollars, to refund in case debts should subsequently come against the estate, was erroneous; this court being of opinion, that, under the circumstances of this case, no such bond should be required—and that liberty ought to be reserved to the parties, to apply to the court for its further aid, if, at any future time, such aid should, in the opinion, become necessary for the due execution of the testator's will.

as a mortgage, was never recorded; and possession of the slave was never delivered to or acquired by the vendee, and could not be at the time the deed was executed, the slave being then a runaway; but the vendor afterwards got possession of him, without the knowledge or consent of the vendee, and then sold him to C. a fair purchaser, for valuable consideration, without notice of the previous bill of sale to B.: HELD, that the bill of sale from L. to B. must be taken for what it was intended to be, a mortgage, which was void as against the subsequent fair purchaser, because it was not recorded according to the statute of conveyances, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 4.

In an action of detinue for a negro man slave named Phil, brought by Bird against Wilkinson, in the circuit court of Henrico, there was a special verdict stating the following case:

John Lunsford, by bill of sale, executed on the 6th August 1822, conveyed the slave Phil, with two others, to Bird. The bill of sale was absolute on its face, and expressed to be made in consideration of 1300 dollars paid by Bird to Lunsford; but it was, in fact, a conditional conveyance, being intended and received as a collateral security for the due application by Lunsford, of a sum of 1300 dollars put into his hands by Bird, to purchase slaves for the latter; it was intended to have the effect of a mortgage or deed of trust. This bill of sale was never recorded. It did not appear, that Lunsford had applied the 1300 dollars put into his hands by Bird, to the purchase of slaves for him, or had returned the money to Bird; no evidence was adduced by either party, as to those points. The slave Phil was not delivered to Bird, at the time the bill of sale was executed; he was then a runaway, so that no actual delivery could have been then made; nor did Bird ever after acquire actual possession of him. But Lunsford got possession of him, and had him secured in the jail of Lancaster; whether with the knowledge or consent of Bird, or not, did not appear.

267 *On the 10th September 1822, Lunsford executed another bill of sale to Osmond Johnson; whereby, in consideration of 400 dollars, he conveyed to him, this slave Phil and sundry others; and, shortly afterwards, he gave Johnson an order on the jailor of Lancaster, for the delivery of the slave to him; and he was delivered to him accordingly. Johnson, thus having the possession, sold the slave to Wilkinson, for a valuable consideration actually paid, and delivered possession to Wilkinson immediately. This was done before this suit was instituted. It was not found that Johnson purchased without notice of the bill of sale previously executed by Lunsford to Bird; but it was found, that Wilkinson was a fair purchaser from Johnson, without notice of Lunsford's bill of sale to Bird. And the question referred to the court, was, Whether, upon this state of the case, Bird was entitled to the slave?

The circuit court held that he was not, and gave judgment for Wilkinson; from which Bird appealed to this court.

Robinson and Scott, for the appellant. The decisions of this court have recognized the general principle of Edwards v. Harben, 2 T. R. 587, and Hamilton v. Russell, 1 Cranch 309, that an absolute bill of sale of goods is fraudulent per se, as to creditors, unless possession accompanies and follows the deed. But Edwards v. Harben is now doubted in England; Steward v. Lombe, 1 Brod. & Bing. 506; 5 Eng. C. L. R. 167. And there, the court established the principle, that the sale will be valid, if such possession be given as the nature of the case admits of. So, if the property is absent at sea, or for any other cause it is impossible for the vendee to take possession, this impossibility is an answer to the presumption of fraud that might otherwise arise. Conrad v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Peters 449; Gardner v. Howland, 2 Pick. 599. In the case cited from Peters, the propriety of the rule that the fact of possession not accompanying and following the deed, is fraud per se, is left an open question; so that Hamilton v. Russell is not now 268 considered *more conclusive in the supreme court of the United States than Edwards v. Harben is in England. In Beals v. Guernsey, 8 Johns. Rep. 348, and Butts v. Swartwood, 2 Cowen 431, sales were sustained, where the vendor's possession continued no longer than convenience required. Like principles have been recognized by the judges of this court, in Land v. Jeffries, 5 Rand. 216, 252, 259, 271, 603, and in Clayton v. Anthony, 6 Rand. 304. In the case now before the court, the slave was a runaway at the time of the sale, so that it was impracticable for the vendor to give, or for the vendee to take, actual possession immediately. The fact of inability to deliver or take possession, is an excuse for non-delivery; and that inability being found here, the sale is valid. To hold otherwise, were in effect to hold, that personal property cannot pass by sale, unless it be capable of being delivered at the time of sale. The circumstance of Lunsford having regained the possession of the runaway slave, cannot affect Bird's title; for Lunsford took the possession without his knowledge or consent, and without any right to exercise that or any other act of ownership over him; and Lunsford's sale to another could pass no title as against Bird.

There is, however, another objection to Bird's title, which will be mainly relied on—that the bill of sale under which he claims, though absolute on its face, was in fact a mortgage or deed of trust, and is void as to subsequent purchasers without notice, because it was not recorded according to the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 4, p. 362. But this objection to a bill of sale, that though absolute on its face, it was intended only as a mortgage, is not matter for a court of law; Robinson v. M'Donnell, 2 Barn. & Ald. 134; *Stark. Law of Ev. part IV. vol. 3, pp. 1002, 1009, n. 2. The remedy is in a court of equity; Ross v. Norvell, 1 Wash. 14. A party ought not to be permitted to claim a benefit from the omission to record a deed, as to whom the registry of it would have been of no

269 avail, if it had been *duly made. If the bill of sale, in this case, had been recorded, and it had been proved that it was in fact intended as a mortgage, this would not have afforded an excuse for the non-delivery of possession to the vendee (per Green, J., 5 Rand. 251,) nor would it have made the deed valid as a mortgage. The rule should work both ways. Here, the bill of sale has not been recorded as a mortgage; and it ought not to be regarded as a mortgage, merely to favor a subsequent purchaser, when he would not have been affected by it as a mortgage, if it had been recorded. It may be of mischievous consequence, to extend the statutes of registry so far as to require deeds to be recorded as deeds of trust or mortgages, which are not so expressed on the face of them: nor is there any necessity for it. For, if the deed be absolute on its face, the rights of creditors and subsequent purchasers are protected by the rule which requires that possession shall accompany and follow the deed, if practicable, or as far as practicable: it is only where the deed is not absolute, but is on its face a deed of trust or mortgage, so that the possession may lawfully be separated from the property, that the law does or ought to require that it shall be recorded. This subject was touched in Land v. Jeffries; and the judges, so far as they expressed opinions upon the point, regarded the statute as applying to such deeds only as are trusts or mortgages on their face; 5 Rand. 221, 272, 615. The counsel for the appellant also cited and commented on Dey v. Dunham, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 182, 191; James v. Johnson & Morey, 6 Id. 417, 432; James v. Morey, 2 Cowen 246, S. C. and Coterell v. Purchase, Ca. Temp. Talbot 61.

The attorney general and Lyons, for the appellee. In any view that can be taken of the case, the bill of sale from Lunsford to Bird must be regarded as fraudulent and void as against Wilkinson, a subsequent fair purchaser, for value paid, without notice. The bill of sale to Bird must be taken for what it purports to be, an absolute sale, or for what it was really intended, a mortgage. As an absolute sale, it 270 *was fraudulent and void, because possession did no wise accompany and follow the deed, and the parties in truth intended that the vendor should retain the possession. The circumstance that the slave was a runaway cannot excuse the non-delivery of the possession, and so bring the case within any of the exceptions to the rule of Edwards v. Harben: because, in the first place, the vendee took no steps whatever to obtain the possession; and, in the next place, the circumstance that the instrument was in truth intended as a mortgage, affords a conclusive answer to the argument, that the actual delivery of possession was impracticable, and therefore not necessary to the validity of the transaction; since it shews, that it was designed that Lunsford should not deliver the possession, as a vendor, but that he might retain it, as a mortgagor. If this bill of sale be taken as a mortgage, as a conveyance with a secret trust, according to the real intent of the parties, it was void, not only because the taking a bill of sale in form, where the real transaction is a mortgage, tends to deceive and injure others, and is therefore fraudulent, but also for the conclusive reason, that it was not recorded; Shields v. Anderson, 3 Leigh 729, 737. If the deed had expressed the real contract between the parties, the law would have required that it should be recorded, in order to give it validity against creditors and subsequent purchasers: the mortgagee could not exempt himself from the duty of recording it, by the omission to express in the instrument the real terms of the contract.

CARR, J. If the transaction between Lunsford and Bird had been, what the bill of sale purports, an absolute sale of slaves, the question would fairly have arisen, whether the fact of the slave in question being at the time a runaway, excused the actual delivery, and whether the subsequent assertion of his right by Bird, and the other facts found, cleared him of the imputation of fraud? It was contended, that a court of law must take this as a bill of sale; and Robinson v. M'Donnell was cited in support of the position; 271 *but to my mind, it does not support it. There, Bell & Clarkson executed a bill of sale for two ships to the Sharps: they retained possession, and acted as owners: the Sharps became bankrupts, and their assignee took possession of one of the ships: at a subsequent time, Bell & Clarkson became bankrupts, and their assignees brought trover for the ship. At the trial, it was proved, that the real consideration of the bill of sale was, that the Sharps should accept Bell & Clarkson's bills to the amount of £12,000, and that the ships were to be a security for their advances upon such acceptances, but were to remain with Bell & Clarkson, until they made default in providing for the acceptances; which they had not done, when the bankruptcy of the Sharps happened, and their assignees took possession of the ship. The plaintiffs were nonsuited at nisi prius, and a rule was moved for at bar, to enter a judgment for them; which, on argument, was refused. Chief justice Abbot said—"I think that it was not competent for Bell & Clarkson to avail themselves of the parol agreement, in contradiction to their own deed. The bill of sale might be void upon the statute of Elizabeth, as against creditors, but not as against the parties who executed it; and their assignees are in this respect, in no better situation." It will be remarked, that the point of the decision was, that a party shall not avail himself of a parol agreement, in contradiction of his own deed; and so far from deciding that a court of law could not, at the instance of any one, receive such evidence, the court decided in effect, that it might; for the chief justice added, that the bill of sale, though good between the parties, might have been void as against creditors; which could only be by their shewing the facts, and disclosing the true nature of the deed. In the case before us, it is not Lunsford the grantor, who seeks to shew, that the bill of sale is in truth a mortgage, but a subsequent purchaser without notice from Lunsford; and as our statute enacts that as to all such purchasers, mortgages shall take effect and be valid, from the time they are proved or acknowledged, and 272 *delivered to the clerk to be recorded, and from that time only, it would seem to follow, that, in whatever court such purchaser is impleaded, he may avail himself of all proper evidence to prove, that the deed, however absolute on its face, is in truth a mortgage; and therefore of no validity as to him, because unrecorded: and then it would devolve on the other party, to prove notice upon him. The evidence then being admissible, the question is, do facts found in the special verdict, prove this a mortgage? And that indeed is no question; for it is found, in so many words, that "it was intended to have the effect of a mortgage or deed of trust;" and whether the one or the other, we know that the effect, in respect to the recording, and subsequent purchasers, is precisely the same.

I do not think it necessary to notice any other point. This is an action of detinue for a slave brought by a mortgagee on an unrecorded mortgage, against a subsequent purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice—and the judgment is for the defendant. I think it must be affirmed.

CABELL, J. As the deed from Lunsford to Bird, although absolute on its face, was intended by the parties, at the time of its execution, to operate only as a mortgage or deed of trust, I am of opinion, that, not having been recorded according to law, it is void as to subsequent purchasers without notice. On this ground, without considering any other, I think the judgment is right and ought to be affirmed.

BROOKE, J. It is the admitted principle of the common law, that the title to personal property passes by the actual delivery, or by a constructive delivery of it, as in the case of Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473, and many like cases. Mortgages and deeds of trust of personal property, which are directed by statute to be recorded, (by which the title passes without actual delivery), do not impair this principle of the common law. A bill of sale of 273 personal property "absolute on its face, is not within the statute, and need not be recorded to give any greater validity to it; and if recorded, it does not affect this common law principle. The possession of the property must accompany it, to make it a valid transfer of the title; unless, indeed, there are unavoidable circumstances (such as in the case of the transfer of a ship at sea) shewing that delivery was impracticable at the time, and that such circumstances made no part of the contract; for, otherwise, if the circumstances which prevented the delivery, made a part of the contract, they ought to be stated on the face of the bill of sale, and it ought to be recorded, in order to give it validity. As regards creditors and subsequent purchasers, where that is not done, the sale or transfer is fraudulent per se; that is, it is prima facie evidence of fraud, which is conclusive until evidence to explain it is introduced; (see my opinion in Land v. Jeffries). But, in the case before us, it appears by the special verdict, that it was not the intention of the owner, Lunsford, to deliver the slave in question to the appellant, though it is found that he was a runaway at the time, but to transfer to him the title of this and two other slaves, as a security for the due application of 1300 dollars, to be laid out in the purchase of other slaves for the appellant. This was one of those secret trusts, which the statute requiring mortgages and deeds of trust to be recorded, intended to inhibit, as to creditors and subsequent purchasers. Therefore, the second bill of sale to Johnson, under whom the appellee claims the same slave, accompanied by delivery of the possession, must prevail, notice to Johnson of the previous bill of sale to Bird, being negatived by the finding of the jury. As to the question raised at the bar, whether evidence of the secret trust was proper at law, there can be no doubt. The bill of sale is only evidence of the title; as to third persons, it does not pass the title of itself, as in the case of a deed recorded for that purpose, in which case, resort is had to a court of equity to remove the deed out of the way of proceedings at law. But its validity may be questioned, by creditors or subsequent purchasers, at law as well as in equity. Stratton v. Minnis, 2 Munf. 329. The judgment must be affirmed.

TUCKER, P. This is, I think, a very clear case against the appellant. The special verdict finds, that the deed under which the plaintiff claims, which is absolute upon its face, was intended and received as a conditional conveyance; that it was intended only to secure the payment of the sum of money specified therein. It was, therefore, in fact, nothing but a mortgage. Now, if it had been a mortgage on its face, it would have been void as to the subsequent purchaser, because it had not been recorded. So far as that purchaser is concerned, it would never have taken effect at all; because mortgages "take effect as to subsequent purchasers from the delivery to the clerk, to be recorded, and from that time only." Can it be then, that the falsehood of the conveyance, places the plaintiff in a better situation, than if the deed had been draughted according to the truth of the case? Can it be that even a fair deed would be considered void, because it is hidden from the eyes of purchasers, and that this deed is good, which, even when seen, hides in impenetrable secrecy from every eye, except those of the parties concerned in the transaction, its real character? I cannot think it. Every well received maxim must be overturned before it can be so: Suppression must become a merit, and falsehood a virtue; and a guilty party must be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong. So far from the absolute form of the deed making the appellant's case better, it stamps it in my judgment with stronger features of fraud, as respects purchasers and creditors. Independently of express adjudications upon the subject, it is but a corollary from the principles established in Twine's case. It is a transaction calculated to work a double fraud; to deceive a double set of creditors and purchasers; creditors and purchasers both of the grantor and grantee. To those of Bird, he is held out as the absolute owner of the slave; and when a creditor seeks to charge it, or a purchaser acquires it, this 275 *secret defeasance is brought forward to defeat them. To the creditors of Lunsford, on the other hand, the property is held out as the absolute property of Bird, while there is a secret trust between the parties, covering the equity of redemption of Lunsford in the mortgaged subject. What transaction can be more directly fraudulent? If I convey my estate to another, without any consideration, upon a secret trust for my benefit, the deed is indelibly stamped with fraud, in all contests with my creditors: Because my grantee covers my property from them. If they confide in the good faith of the transaction, they are led to suppose, that that property is not chargeable with their debt. And if this be so, where there is no consideration, how does it differ where there is a false consideration? where there is an equity of redemption, which the creditor would have a right to subject to his demand, which, by the falsehood of the deed, is hidden from his view?

The authorities, I think, very strongly sustain this view of the case; but it is unnecessary to examine them.

Judgment affirmed.

Raynolds v. Gore.

February, 1833.

Bail—Insufficient—Waiver of Objection.—On a capias ad respondendum, on which appearance bail is required, the sheriff takes insufficient bail, but the plaintiff proceeds against the bail, and recovers judgment against him as well as the principal, without objecting to the sufficiency of the bail, at the rules or in court, at or before the first term after the return day of the writ, or at any time pending the suit: Held, the plaintiff cannot afterwards maintain an action against the sheriff for taking insufficient bail.

Bail Bond*—Failure to Insert Name of Bail—Waiver of Objection.—A bail bond is executed by the principal and the bail, though the name of the bail is not inserted in the body of the bond (there being a blank left for his name) which, in other respects, is a regular bail bond, and the plaintiff proceeds on the bond and recovers judgment against the bail as well as principal, and this judgment stands unreversed: Held,

1. This is the bond of the bail, though his name is not inserted in the body of it; and,
2. Same—Same—Same—Right to Action against Sheriff.—If it were a defective bond, the plaintiff having a judgment on the bond against the bail, could not maintain an action against the sheriff for returning a defective bail bond.

Case in the circuit court of Frederick, by Jane Raynolds against Joshua Gore late sheriff of that county, for official negligence in executing process. The declaration alleged, that Raynolds having sued out a capias ad respondendum, in an action of assumpsit, against one Hooker, on which appearance bail was required by an order of a justice of the peace of Frederick, this process, with an order requiring bail, was put into the hands of one of Gore's deputies to be executed, and Hooker was by him thereupon arrested; and that the sheriff did not faithfully perform the duty imposed on him by the order requiring appearance bail. The negligence imputed to the sheriff, in the two material counts, was—1. that the appearance bail he took, was insufficient; and 2. that he took an imperfect bail bond, not obligatory on the person whom he accepted as appearance bail, and so, in effect, failed to take bail at all. By reason whereof, though the plaintiff recovered judgment by default against Hooker and the appearance bail returned by the sheriff, she failed in recovering the amount adjudged to her against them. To these two counts Gore pleaded the general issue.

277 *At the trial, the plaintiff filed two bills of exceptions to instructions given by the court to the jury.

1. The first stated, that the plaintiff gave in evidence the record of her action against Hooker, by which it appeared, that the sheriff returned upon her process against him, that he had executed the same, and that one Russell was the appearance bail; whereupon regular proceedings were had against Hooker, and Russell as his appearance bail; judgment by default was recovered against them for the damages assessed in a writ of inquiry, upon which a fieri facias was sued out against both jointly, and proved unavailing. But the plaintiff did not, at any time, during the pendency of her suit against Hooker, take any exceptions to the sufficiency of Russell as his appearance bail in that suit. Whereupon, the court, on the motion of Gore's counsel, instructed the jury, that even if they should find that Russell was insufficient bail at the date of the bail bond, yet, as to that point, they should find for Gore, upon the issue joined upon the first count in the declaration above stated, because Raynolds, having failed to take exceptions to the sufficiency of Russell, as appearance bail for Hooker in her action against him, during the pendency thereof, within the time prescribed by the statute,[†] could not now in this action against the sheriff, take advantage of the insufficiency of the appearance bail taken by him in the action against Hooker: to which opinion the plaintiff excepted.

2. It appeared by the other bill of exceptions, that the name of Russell was not inserted in the body of the bail

278 *bond taken and returned by the sheriff in Raynolds's action against Hooker: the bail bond ran thus—"Know all men by these presents, that we W. Hooker and — are held and firmly bound unto Joshua Gore sheriff of Frederick" &c. But the bond was signed, sealed and delivered by Russell, and was a regular bail bond in all respects, except that Russell's name was not inserted in the blank. Whereupon, the plaintiff's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, that this was not the bond of Russell, because his name no where appeared in the body of it, and that if it was not Russell's bond, they ought to find for the plaintiff, in this action, on the issue joined on the second count above stated. But the court refused to give such instruction; and instructed the jury, on the contrary, that though Russell's name did not appear in the body of the bond, yet not being excluded from it, and having been executed by him, it was his bond; and further, that, as the plaintiff in her action against Hooker, had proceeded on this bond as Russell's bond, and recovered judgment against Hooker and Russell as his appearance bail, which judgment was still in full force, it was not competent to her, in this action, to call in question the validity and effect of the bail bond. To this opinion also the plaintiff excepted.

[†]1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 45, 46, p. 500. The statute, after providing, that if the appearance bail returned by the sheriff be objected to by the plaintiff, and be adjudged insufficient by the court, and the defendant shall fail to give special bail, the sheriff shall thereupon be considered a party to the proceedings, and together with the appearance bail, shall be subject to the same judgment and recovery as the appearance bail alone would have been subject to.—provides, further, that "objections to the sufficiency of appearance bail shall be taken either at the rules, or in court, at or before the first term after the return day of the writ, and not thereafter: they shall be decided by the court without delay, and the burden of proof shall lie on the party affirming the sufficiency."—Note in Original Edition.

There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant; from which the plaintiff appealed to this court.

Nicholas argued, for the appellant, that, at common law, an action on the case lay against a sheriff for any default in the performance of his official duty, and, in particular, for neglecting to take bail when required, and of course, for taking insufficient bail; and that the proceeding against the sheriff given by the statute of Virginia, in case of insufficient appearance bail taken and returned by him, did not deprive the plaintiff of his common law remedy, if he chose to resort to it. As to the objection to the validity of the bail bond, because the name of the bail no where appeared in the body of it, he cited Harrison v. 279 Tiernans, 4 Rand. *177, where it was held, that a bail bond blank as to the sum to be paid, was a mere nullity; and Smith v. Crooker, 5 Mass. Rep. 538.

THERE WAS NO COUNSEL FOR THE APPELLEE.

PER CURIAM. There is no error in the directions given by the circuit court to the jury. Judgment affirmed.

Guerrant & Watkins exhibited their bill, in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond against William Fleming and George

In Doswell v. Anderson, 1 Pat. & H. 194, it is said: “With regard to the account of Dr. Fleming, that stands on a different footing. It seems to be a reasonable one. The services were rendered to the beneficiaries and the trust slaves, and, no doubt, were necessary for their preservation. There was no improper dealing between him and any of the beneficiaries. When a physician is called on to visit the sick, humanity, and often urgent necessity, require his immediate attendance. He cannot stop to enquire from whence his pay is to come, or to bargain with a trustee; and concurring, as we all cordially do, in the decision of the court of appeals, in the case of Markham v. Guerrant & Watkins, 4 Leigh 279, I am of opinion, that this account, on the authority of that case, should be paid, even if it should be necessary to sell a portion of the trust property for the purpose.”

Markham the surviving trustees, Lucy the widow of John Markham then dead, and their children, eleven in number, all but two of whom were infants—setting forth the deed of trust; alleging, that between the first of April and the last of October 1818, they, relying on the credit of the trust estate, had furnished sundry necessary supplies of merchandize, to John Markham (in his lifetime) and his family, for their domestic use, to the amount of 344 dollars; that, on application to Fleming, the trustee, he had assumed the payment of the debt out of the trust estate, by a letter to the plaintiffs, which they exhibited with their bill; that John Markham had 281 lately died, leaving no property *what-ever, but the trust estate; and praying, that the trustee should render an account of the trust estate, and that the plaintiffs' demand might be provided for and paid, either out of the profits, or by a sale of a part of the trust subject for the purpose.

Fleming answered, that he had been, from the first, the only acting trustee, the trustee Harris having died shortly after the execution of the deed, and G. Markham having declined the trust; that he was largely in advance to the trust; that many of the slaves had been sold to pay the debts of John Markham due at the date of the deed of trust; that there remained of the trust subject, only the land and three labouring slaves, and many young ones that required support; that the supplies alleged by the plaintiffs to have been furnished by them, were made without his knowledge or consent, and having regard to the trust property, were enormous in amount; that as to his alleged assumpsit to pay the plaintiffs' claim out of the trust subject, the fair construction of his letter exhibited by them to prove the assumpsit, was, that he only consented that the plaintiffs' account, so far as it should appear just, might be paid out of the profits of the estate, as they might arise; that he had no competent authority, as trustee, to apply the principal to the payment of this debt: and he stated some specific objections to the plaintiffs' account.

The trustee George Markham answered, that he had never undertaken the trust, and had on the contrary declined it.

Lucy Markham, the widow, in her answer, admitted that the plaintiffs furnished her husband with goods to a large amount. And Bernard Markham, one of the children, said in his answer, that he was not in Virginia during the time of the dealings between the plaintiffs and his father; he believed, part of the articles charged in the plaintiffs' account was procured for the use of his father's family, but to what amount he was ignorant; and he referred to, and relied upon, the answer of the trustee Fleming.

282 *Fleming died pending the suit, and it was revived against his executor, and the cause regularly matured for hearing against the other defendants.

The letter of the trustee Fleming, exhibited with the bill, was addressed to the plaintiff Guerrant; it was dated the 1st November 1818, and was in these words: "Dear sir, I have received your letter of yesterday's date; and in answer thereto, say, that I had but a slight view, for a few minutes only, of the account you sent over by Mr. Markham, who took it away, and I have never seen it since; however, sir, if you will agree to wait till the next crop, I will assume the payment of it out of the trust estate; and I am free to allow, that every thing that shall be made on that estate for market, whilst I remain a trustee, shall be applied to furnish necessaries for the family, though not at the will or caprice of John Markham himself, who was here to-day, and is generally much deranged in his mind. I became a trustee for the estate in July 1810, and have never disposed of a dollar's worth of the profits of the estate, except 120 bushels of wheat, delivered at Dover mills in November 1810, to Isaac Webster, to pay him in part for 300 dollars he advanced to redeem one of Mr. Markham's negroes then under execution: the balance of the 300 dollars I paid to Mr. Webster out of my own pocket, and since have advanced for the estate near 1000 dollars more, and 314 dollars of it, since last December; and yet he says he neither owes me or any other person a dollar. I will endeavour to get the account from John Markham, and if I fail, shall apply to you for a copy of it at a future day. (Signed) W. Fleming."

According to the report of a commissioner made in pursuance of an interlocutory order in the cause, the profits of the trust estate, were 300 dollars per annum.

Whereupon, the court, declaring that the plaintiffs' demand was properly chargeable on the trust subject conveyed by the deed of the 25th June 1810, and ought to be paid out of the rents and profits thereof in such manner as should be least injurious to the interests of the cestui que trust, 283 *and that Fleming the only acting trustee being dead, there was no person charged with the execution of the trust,—therefore decreed, that the marshal of the court should take possession of the trust subject, real and personal, and annually rent and hire out so much thereof as should be necessary to raise the annual sum of 150 dollars (having regard to the convenience and interest of the widow Lucy Markham and her family) and annually collect the rents and profits, and, after paying his own charges and expenses, pay the plaintiffs annually on the 1st June, 150 dollars, until the debt due them (adjudged to be 257 dollars) with interest thereon from October 1818, should be paid; provided, that if Lucy Markham the widow, or after her death, the defendants who should then become entitled to the trust subject, or any person for them should, in each year successively, give bond with surety to the marshal, to make the annual payment of 150 dollars to the plaintiffs, then they should not be disturbed in their possession, respectively, of the trust subject.

From this decree, on the petition of Lucy Markham the widow, an appeal was allowed by this court.

The cause was argued by Stanard for the appellant, and Rhodes for the appellees, upon the following points—

I. Whether there was any sufficient proof to establish the demand of the appellees on John Markham? and whether the letter of the trustee Fleming to the appellee Guerrant of the 1st November 1818, amounted to an assumpsit of the debt?

II. Supposing the demand established as against Markham,—whether any such debt contracted by him, could be charged on the prospective profits of the trust estate, so as to bereave his wife and children, especially after his death, of the use of those profits for their support and maintenance? The whole profits appearing from the estimated amount thereof, and the number of persons to be maintained out of them, to be inadequate to supply more than a bare subsistence to the cestuis que trust.

284 *III. Supposing the letter of the trustee Fleming, to amount to an assumpsit of the debt, whether any act or assumpsit of the trustee, could rightfully pledge the prospective profits of the trust subject necessary for the current support of his cestuis que trust, to pay debts contracted even by the trustee himself for their past support? much more debts contracted by one of the cestuis que trust, now no longer entitled to the profits or any part thereof, against the will and without the knowledge of the trustee?

CARR, J. The appellants allege in their bill, that they furnished supplies of merchandize to the amount of 344 dollars, for the use of Markham and his family, between the first of June and the last of October 1818, and that they furnished these supplies on the credit of the trust estate. Yet it is clear, these dealings took place without any previous directions from Fleming (the only acting trustee) to them, to credit Markham for the goods, or any communication with him on the subject. Was this a safe and prudent course in the plaintiffs? Could they charge the trust subject by crediting Markham, without the knowledge or assent of the trustee? Look at the circumstances of the case; the manifest occasion and intention, and the provisions, of the deed of trust. Here was a man with a wife and eleven children, whose habits and course were likely to waste his estate, and bring his family to want; to arrest this evil, and take out of his hands, the management of his affairs, and the power of dissipating his property, he is prevailed on to execute this deed, by which he strips himself of every atom of his estate; making provision for debts already contracted, but expressly disabling himself from so incurring future debts, as to make the property (no longer his) liable for them. This he had a right to do, and it was done openly; the deed was duly recorded, and the facts, of necessity, known to these appellants; for they state, that they dealt upon the credit of the trust fund, and make the deed and exhibit. By this deed they were told, that this was a permanent 285 *fund, the profits of which alone could be taken for the yearly maintenance of this large family; for it is clearly expressed, that the parties could not sell an atom of the principal except for the payment of the existing debts of Markham.

Nor was the trustee as in the case of Scott v. Loraine, 6 Munf. 117, bound to permit the cestuis que trust "to receive, take and enjoy all the interest and profits of the estate," thereby rendering it safe to deal with them to the amount of those profits; but the whole profits here, were to be applied by the trustees to the payment of the debts and support of the family. In Scott v. Loraine, the purpose of the deed was merely to intercept the marital rights, and shield the property from the husband's creditors: here it was to shield it from the improvidence and waste of the cestuis que trust, and to make that which, under their management, would have been dissipated in a short time, a permanent fund, which should, from its profits, furnish some support to the family during the life of the father and mother, and then be divided among their children; whereby they gained a vested interest, which, so far at least as the land was concerned, could not, even by a court, be divested during their infancy, except for debts of the grantor, existing at the date of the deed. The commissioner estimated the annual profits of this fund, at only 300 dollars; and we know that such estimates are generally beyond the mark. However this may be, it behooves every one, who deals on the credit of a fund like this, to look to the deed, and see how much can be disbursed; and to make his bargain beforehand with the trustee. In this case, then, I do not think, that the appellees, by their dealings with the family, acquired any right to charge the trust fund: if they did, every other person who chose to let the cestuis que trust have goods or property, would have the same right; and thus the check interposed by the deed would be destroyed, and one year's extravagance swallow up the revenue of years to come, and leave the wife and children to starve.

286 *The appellees, however, do not rest their claim on the sole ground of this dealing with the family. After closing the account, they made application by letter to the trustee; and they rely on his answer as an assumpsit of the debt. This letter acknowledges the receipt of their's of the day before; and says he had had but a slight view of their account, which Markham had carried away with him, but that if they will agree to wait till the next crop, he will assume to pay them out of the trust estate, being willing, while he remains trustee, that every thing that should be made on that estate for market, should be applied to furnish necessities for the family, though not at the will or caprice of Markham, who is generally much deranged in his mind. This, it will be observed, is rather a proposition to assume, provided the creditors would wait, that an actual assumpsit. But take it for an assumpsit; to what does it amount? A promise to pay out of the produce of the next crop made on the trust estate, for market. Could the trustee bind the fund in this way? Could he incur in one year, debts to the amount of several years profits, and thus by anticipation absorb the support of future years? I incline strongly to think not. He is intrusted with the fund, not to squander at will, but to husband, protect, and apply it according to a sound discretion, to the support of the family from year to year. In regard to this point, his duty resembles a good deal that of a guardian; who, we know, is not suffered in any year to go beyond the profits of his ward's estate, without the express permission of the court. Here was a yearly fund of 300 dollars, for the yearly support of the family; to constitute which support, many articles would be necessary, besides merchandize; and yet we see, that, in the term of six months, these merchants have raised an account of more than the whole annual income; and that income, for the current year, having been already spent, this debt is to be thrown upon the next year's revenue. The whole, will not pay it: how, then, was the family to be supported? The deed gives no power to the trustee to break in upon 287 *the principal. Could he thus by anticipation rob the family of their support? I would much sooner say, that he should be personally bound by any such promise, than that he should bind the fund; and if before opening an account with the family, these merchants had applied to the trustee to know how far they might go in trusting the cestuis que trust, and he had said, "you may let them have goods to the amount of 300 dollars," I would have held him personally liable in the first place, and have left him to reimburse himself from any annual surpluses, after supporting the family, if any such should chance to occur. But they have taken no such prudent course; they have gone on at their own risk, to furnish goods to this family, to a most extravagant amount, compared with their income; and they must abide the consequences of their own imprudence.

Another objection to the claim of the appellees, is, that they have not established their account. They rely for this, on the trustee's letter, and the answer of some of the defendants; but these, in my mind, are very inadequate to the purpose. The letter cannot be fairly considered as the slightest acknowledgment of the justice of the items in the account; for the writer expressly says, that he had had but a few moments to look at it, and that he must get it again. He evidently had no idea of admitting the items; but merely meant to say, that he was willing the profits of the estate should be applied to what might be found due. So Mrs. Markham, in her answer, merely says that the plaintiffs furnished her husband with goods to a large amount; but this is wholly indefinite, and no more proof of the account rendered, than of one double its amount, and consisting of items wholly different. So of the answer of B. Markham; it amounts to nothing like proof. The trustee in his answer objects strongly, both to the enormous amount of the account, compared with the income, well known to the plaintiffs, and also to many items in it; and disclaims all idea of intending to admit by his letter, any more than should be proved to be due.

288 *Upon the whole, I think the decree should be reversed and the bill dismissed, without prejudice to any other remedy to which the appellees may be advised to resort.

CABELL, J. I concur in the opinion of judge Carr; understanding it, as we all do, not to deny the power of a court of chancery, to authorize the sale of the personal property of infant cestuis que trust, in cases where such sale shall be absolutely necessary for their support.

TUCKER, P. I concur also, with the same qualification.

*Nicholas v. Burruss.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Wills—Slaves—Emancipation—Case at Bar.—Testator bequeaths, that all his slaves who at the time of his death should be 40 years of age, should serve one year and no longer, and then be emancipated; all who should then be 30 and under 40, should serve till they should be 40, and then be emancipated; all who should be 20 and under 30, should serve till they should be 35, and then be emancipated; and all under 20, should serve till they should be 31, and then be emancipated:

Same—Same—Same—Suit for Freedom—Assent of Executor—Sufficiency of Proof.—In an action at law, brought by one of the slaves, who was under 20 at testator's death and now 31, to recover his freedom, the defendant demurs to the evidence, which consists, 1. of the testator's will; 2. proof that the executor, not long after testator's death assented to liberation of four slaves who were then by the will entitled to freedom; 3. proof, that, in the opinion of witnesses, and as the executor himself had said, in open court, the testator's estate, other than his slaves, was amply sufficient for payment of his debts, though executor's accounts of administration had never been settled; and 4. proof, that the pauper plaintiff was, in the executor's presence, sold under execution on a judgment against the executor for a debt of the testator, under which sale defendant claims: Held, from such evidence, stated in demurrer to evidence, the assent of the executor to the emancipation of the plaintiff under his testator's will, may fairly be inferred: and, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment of freedom.

Same—Same—Same—Same—Necessity for.—Quære, whether upon a will emancipating slaves, the executor's assent to the bequest is necessary to perfect the right to freedom? And per TUCKER, P., it is so: and without such assent, no action at law can be maintained by the freedmen to recover freedom.

This was a suit in forma pauperis, brought in the county court of Goochland, by Nicholas, a negro pauper, against Bur-ness, for the recovery of the plaintiff's freedom. The pleadings were in the usual form, and an issue joined on the question whether the plaintiff was bound or free. Upon the trial the defendant demurred to the evidence, which was set forth at large in the demurrer, and was as follows:

1. The plaintiff gave in evidence the last will and testament of John Peyton, dated the 9th October 1801, and duly recorded in the county court of Fluvanna; whereby he devised and bequeathed as follows—"It is my will and desire that the tract of land on which I now live together with my 290 *tract of land in the county of Prince William, as also the interest which may be drawn on my certificates, as also the slaves I may die possessed of, with all the stock of horses, &c. and the household furniture and plantation utensils of every kind, shall remain undisposed of until the death of Mrs. Mary Duncan with whom I now live, for the purpose of supporting her and her children. It is my will and desire, that all my slaves who at the day of my death shall be forty years of age and upwards, shall serve for one year, and no longer, and then be emancipated; all those who shall be thirty years of age and under forty, to serve until they be forty years of age, and no longer, and then be emancipated; all those who shall be twenty years of age and under thirty, to serve until they shall be thirty-five years of age, and then be emancipated; and all who shall be under twenty years of age, to serve until they shall be thirty-one years of age, and no longer; and if during the servitude of any of the female slaves, they shall have any child or children, such child or children in like manner shall serve, the males until they are twenty-one, and the females until they be eighteen years of age, and no longer, and then be emancipated." The testator then devised 1000 acres of land in the western country for the use of his slaves, and 3000 acres of western lands to three devisees, in equal shares: he devised that his land in Fluvanna, and another parcel of land lying in Prince William, and his stock of horses &c. should be sold, after Mrs. Duncan's death, and bequeathed the proceeds of the sale in legacies; he also bequeathed other pecuniary legacies; and, as to his slaves between the death of Mrs. Duncan and the periods at which they were to be emancipated, he bequeathed them to a nephew and five children of Mrs. Duncan; and he gave the residue of his estate to Mrs. Duncan's children. John Quarles, an executor named in the will, duly qualified as such.

2. The plaintiff adduced evidence, that the executor, Quarles, in the year 1801, shortly after the testator's death, 291 came to the county court, and being asked by the court, whether he considered the testator's estate sufficient for the payment of his debts, answered in the affirmative, and at the same time, in open court, assented to the liberation of four of the testator's slaves (other than the plaintiff) who by his will were then entitled to be emancipated: and that, in the opinion of a witness examined to that point, the testator left property sufficient to pay all his debts, besides the slaves emancipated by him, but there was no account of the executor's administration adduced to prove the fact. There were 4000 acres of land in the western country, and 600 acres of land in Virginia, still held by his devisees. But proof was adduced by the defendant, that the testator had been a merchant for many years, and had had many transactions.

3. Evidence was adduced, that the plaintiff, Nicholas, was one of the testator's slaves emancipated by his will, but whose actual manumission was postponed to a distant day when he should attain the prescribed age, and that the executor Quarles died before he had attained to that age; but there was no direct evidence adduced, that the executor had ever at any time given his assent to the plaintiff's recovery of his freedom, in this or any other form.

And then, 4. the defendant shewed in evidence, a fieri facias, sued out by one Lightfoot, in October 1810, on a judgment of the county court of Fluvanna, recovered by him against Quarles the executor of the testator Peyton, for 57 dollars with interest and costs, to be levied of the goods and chattels of the testator in the executor's hands; and proved, that this execution was levied on the plaintiff Nicholas, then in the executor's hands as part of his testator's estate, and that the plaintiff was sold 292 by the sheriff at auction for 135 *dollars, out of which the execution was satisfied; and that Quarles attended this sale, and invited a person present to bid for the property, stating that the title was good except as to a claim of R. B. Peyton's children. Under this sale, the defendant claimed.

And this being all the evidence in the cause, the defendant demurred thereto, and the plaintiff joined in the demurrer.

Whereupon, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court on the matters of law arising on the demurrer. The county court held, that the law on the demurrer was for the plaintiff, and gave judgment that he was a free man. The defendant appealed to the circuit court, which reversed the judgment; and then the plaintiff appealed to this court.

The cause was argued by the attorney general, assigned counsel for the pauper appellant, and Nicholas for the appellee.

There were several very interesting points discussed at the bar, with much earnestness and ability, but not decided by the court—Whether, upon the construction of the statute authorizing the emancipation of slaves, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 53, 54, 55, 56, it be necessary, in the case of emancipation by will, in order to entitle the slave to his freedom, that the executor should assent to the bequest? or whether the right to freedom is not immediately vested in the freedman, by the will and by force of the provisions of the statute, independently of any assent of the executor to date of this proceeding, for the testator's will bears date the 9th October 1801; and supposing he died in the after part of that year, yet the slaves of forty years of age and upwards, at his death, who were the first to be emancipated, were to serve one year, and then be emancipated.—Note in Original Edition.

*There seems to have been some mistake in the the bequest? Whether, even supposing the assent of the executor to be necessary, the freedman may not, upon the construction of the statute concerning pauper suits, Id. ch. 124, p. 481, maintain a pauper suit at law to recover his freedom, before and without assent to the bequest given by the executor? And whether, in such case, the court of law may not, and ought not, to proceed upon equitable principles, and adjudge freedom, if a case be made out in which a court of equity would decree it?

293 *But the cause was decided on another point taken by the attorney general; namely, that it might fairly be inferred from the evidence set forth in the demurrer to evidence, that the executor Quarles did assent to the bequest of freedom to all the slaves emancipated by his testator's will. Green v. Judith, 5 Rand. 1; Hansbrough's ex'ors v. Thom, 3 Leigh 147. The argument on this question of fact, is stated at length in the opinion of the judges.

CARR, J. It is well settled, that in considering the evidence, in cases of demurrers to evidence, the court will draw any inference against the demurrant, which could fairly be drawn by a jury. It does this of necessity, because it is put in the place of the jury; and it does it the more freely, because it is considered not favorable to justice, to encourage this withdrawal of the facts from the appropriate tribunal. The will of the testator Peyton, provides, that such of his slaves as were then 40 years old and upwards, should serve one year and no longer, and then be emancipated; and emancipates such of his slaves as were younger, prospectively, in classes, as they should attain to particular ages. Not long after the will was proved, in 1801, the executor, in open court, declared his assent to the liberation of four slaves, then entitled to their freedom under the will; and being asked by the court, said he considered the estate sufficient to pay the debts. It is also proved by other testimony, that the estate was fully sufficient, without the slaves, for the payment of all the testator's debts; and that, at the time of the trial, there were, forming a part of his estate, 4000 acres of land in the western country, and 600 acres in Virginia. Notwithstanding these facts, an execution on a judgment obtained against the executor, was levied on the plaintiff, who was under the age prescribed by the will for his manumission, and had still some years to serve, when the execution was levied (how many we do not exactly know) and under this execution he was sold for 135 dollars; the executor attending the sale, and the rather en-

294 couraging *it than otherwise. The executor died subsequently, and before the plaintiff attained to the age appointed for his manumission. Upon these facts, there can be no doubt, that, in equity and justice, the plaintiff is entitled to his freedom. The only doubt is, whether being in a court of law, we can, without violating its forms and principles, mete out that justice to him. The point of doubt is, whether the jury might fairly have inferred, from the evidence, the executor's assent to the emancipation? I think it might. With respect to what shall constitute such assent, the law has prescribed no specific form: a very slight assent is held sufficient; and it may be either express or implied. Any expression or act done by an executor, which shews his concurrence or agreement to the thing bequeathed, will amount to an assent; and as an assent is but a perfecting act, the executor cannot, after he has once given it, revoke it. A house and land held by lease, is devised to A. for part of the term, and to B. for the residue; the assent to A's legacy, enures to B. also. 4 Bac. Abr. Legacies, L. p. 444-6; Toll. Law ex'ors, book 3, ch. 4, § 2, p. 307; *Plow. 521, 540; Wentw. Off. ex'ors 234. Now, according to these authorities, it seems to me, that, by proclaiming in court the sufficiency of the estate to pay all debts, and assenting to the freedom of the slaves then of the proper age, the executor has done that perfecting act, which shewed his concurrence with the bequest, and which enured equally to all the slaves: for, in point of right to freedom, they all stood on the same ground, and the bequest was but as one; and we know, that, if the estate had not been in a situation to free them all, as they came to the age designated, no court would permit the executor to manumit some and make slaves of others, but the burden of servitude would have been equally distributed. If it should be said, that the sale of the negro afterwards in the presence of the executor, shews that he had not assented; I answer, no; it could not shew

295 that, for the former act must speak for itself. The most it could *shew, would be an intention in the executor to recall the assent formerly given; which, as we have seen, he had no right to do. But I do not think we are forced to conclude that it shewed even this; for, it is to be observed, that the will was of record; the declaration of the executor had been made in open court; and in addition to this, the negro was sold but for 135 dollars; not more than three years hire; and he had probably a longer term than that to serve. Under these circumstances, may we not infer, that the price was regulated by the knowledge of these facts, and the consequent right of the plaintiff? I think, in common charity to the executor, this may be inferred. Placing the cause upon this ground. I am relieved from considering the other points raised, and argued with great ability, by the attorney general; and as they are grave and important, and new points, and only three judges are present, I choose, so far as I am concerned, to leave them open. I approve the judgment of the county court.

CABELL, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. This case has been very ably argued, upon various interesting points; but I am inclined to think it must turn at last upon the evidence set forth in the demurrer, and the general principles of law in relation to demurrers to evidence.

That a slave emancipated by will, cannot successfully assert his freedom by a proceeding in a court of law, without the previous assent of the executor to his emancipation, has certainly been the general impression of the profession in Virginia. I think it a correct one. The analogy is strong and apt, between emancipation and a specific legacy. Emancipation is a legacy of freedom to the slave, on the one hand, and, on the other, an abstraction of the value of the slave from that fund (the personality) which, from the foundations of the common law, has been held sacred to the discharge of the debts of the testator.

296 The anomalous character *of this species of property, and the liberal and beneficent spirit in which the law of emancipation has been administered, has given rise, indeed, to some distinctions between the legacy of freedom and an ordinary specific legacy. Thus, for instance, an emancipated slave is not required to give a refunding bond; and, in case of deficiency of assets, though the specific legatees may be compelled to abate proportionably, emancipated slaves would only be compelled to abate as between themselves. In other words, all other specific legacies must be swept, before an emancipated slave can be subjected to the debts at all. Yet I think it cannot be questioned, that, in general, a legacy of freedom has been looked upon by the courts as of the character of a specific legacy. If so, until the executor assent, it cannot be demanded by action at law, unless some act of the legislature, or some principle of convenience, shall establish a difference in favor of the suitor for freedom.

That a specific legatee shall not recover his legacy at law, without the assent of the executor, is a principle that grows out of the character of his trust, the nature of his interest in the personal estate, and the imperfection of common law proceedings. The executor is, especially, a trustee for the creditors of the decedent. The law casts the whole of the personality upon him, at the instant of his testator's death, and enjoins the payment of the debts of the estate as the first duty to be fulfilled, after discharging the sacred obligation of interring the deceased. In the performance of this duty, he is to disregard all the commands even of the testator's will in conflict with it. He is not to lessen the fund for the payment of the creditors, by fulfilling his benevolences, or even supporting his bereaved family. Until the debts are paid, nothing is to be abstracted. The testator is required to be just before he is generous; and even the act of emancipation must yield to the demands of creditors.

To effect the objects of this trust, the law casts the property upon the executor. It considers him the absolute owner; and though after the discharge 297 of all the debts, he *may be compelled by the proper tribunal to pay the legacies and make distribution, even this cannot be done until an investigation has been made of the affairs of the estate, and the state of the demands against it. And even then, though a balance may appear against him, the legatee or distributee must give a refunding bond, before he can insist upon payment. The necessity for this investigation, and the further necessity for adjusting the pretensions of legatees in case of abatement, and of the persons entitled to the residuum when distribution is to be made, conspire to render a court of common law an unfit tribunal for the legatee who sues without the previous assent of the executor; and hence the jurisdiction is now, without contradiction, admitted to be vested in courts of equity exclusively.

To the case of a slave who claims his freedom under the will of his master, all the reasons which confine the jurisdiction of suits for legacies before assent, apply with additional force. For (as we have all seen from the case of Patty v. Colin, 1 Hen. & Munf. 519, and the recent cases of Dunn v. Amey, 1 Leigh 465, and Paup v. Mingo, ante 163,) many formidable difficulties arise in these suits for freedom, peculiar to them, and insuperable unless by the aid of a court of equity. I am of opinion, therefore, that a slave cannot recover his freedom under a will, in a court of law, without proving the assent of the executor, if, as I shall attempt to shew, such assent is necessary.

It seems to have been supposed, however, in the argument, that by the statute concerning pauper suits, a slave may, if he pleases, assert his right to freedom in a court of law, and adopt the common law process, and yet be permitted to go into all those matters which belong peculiarly to a court of equity, and to have such redress as that court could afford him. This would certainly be very inconvenient, and is as certainly, I think, an incorrect interpretation of the statute. That a court of equity has jurisdiction, in proper cases, of suits for freedom, no longer admits of dispute, after the repeated 298 decisions of this court, and the *cases in which the jurisdiction has been entertained. Dempsey v. Laurence, Gilm. 333, and Dunn v. Amey, and Patty v. Colin, just cited. Yet if we look to the act itself, though there would seem reason to doubt the jurisdiction of the superiour courts of chancery, there is none for supposing that the slave was to be confined to the courts of law alone. As I think the act has been much misunderstood, it may not be amiss to offer my idea of its construction.

Until this act was passed, the remedy of a person held in slavery for the recovery of his freedom, was unregulated. The writs of habeas corpus and de homine replegiando were, among others, resorted to. They were vexatious in their character; and the latter has been accordingly repealed, while the provisions in relation to the former rendered it an objectionable and improper remedy for the trial of the right of a slave to his freedom. Therefore, by the act of 1795, ch. 11, a plain and easy remedy was provided. The preamble distinctly evinces, that it was suggested, less by an anxiety to facilitate the remedies of the slave, than by "the great and alarming mischiefs, which had arisen in other states of the Union, and were likely to arise in this, by voluntary associations of individuals" (commonly known under the appellation of emancipation societies) "who had, in many instances, been the means of depriving masters of their property in slaves, and in others occasioned them heavy expenses in tedious and unfounded law suits." Accordingly, its scheme seems to have been to require in the incipient stages of the proceeding, some evidence of the probability of his right, before he should be either removed from his master's possession, or entitled to call upon him to answer his complaint. Therefore, it provided, that the complaint should either be made to a magistrate out of court, or to the district (now circuit) or county or corporation court, and not elsewhere; a negative provision inserted for the master's benefit, not for that of the slave. Upon offering his petition to the court, he is required to set forth the material facts of his case, supported by affidavit or otherwise;

299 whereupon *counsel are appointed, who are required to make an exact statement of the case, with their opinion thereupon; and the court, accordingly, makes an order allowing or refusing the prayer of the petitioner to bring suit. The form in which this suit is to be brought, is not prescribed. But the statute having authorized the application to two courts, one of which had complete equitable jurisdiction, there is nothing from which we are necessarily to infer, that the legislature intended to obliterate the distinctions of jurisdiction, in the case of suits for freedom, more than in other cases. When the slave applied to counsel to draw and present his petition, that counsel, according to the nature of the case, should prefer the petition to the court of law, or to that court which combines in itself the powers both of law and chancery. If the claim should admit of being prosecuted in a court of law, it might be presented either to the county or circuit court. If equity alone could administer a relief, it ought to be presented to the county court, where it might be tried on the chancery side; and though it may be admitted there can be no mere equitable right to freedom, yet it has also been admitted that cases may occur where the suitor may need the aid of a court of equity.

Such I have no doubt was the scheme of the act, and accordingly I can see no reason for supposing, that a suit for freedom may be tried in a court of law upon equitable principles and equitable modes of proceeding. Nor does the idea receive countenance, as was supposed, from the language of the statute concerning pauper suits, that the court "shall appoint, in pauper suits, all proper officers &c." and so, may appoint auditors to settle the administration account. For this clause was not a part of the act of 1795, ch. 11, and therefore cannot bear upon it, even if the inferences drawn by the counsel were at all admissible. I am, therefore, of opinion, upon the whole matter, that if the necessity for the assent of the executor to the legacy of freedom, stands upon the footing of the assent to other specific legacies, that assent is necessary to be proved, in order *to entitle the slave to recover his freedom, by action in a court of law.

I have already endeavoured to shew, why it is that the assent of the executor to a specific legacy, is essential to its vesting as a legal right. The executor holding the estate upon the sacred trust of appropriating it first to the discharge of debts, will never be compelled to deliver it over, until by his assent it is admitted, or by a judicial proceeding it is established, that there is no longer a necessity to withhold it. The latter lays the ground of the jurisdiction of equity in the matter; the former is the only ground on which that of courts of law has ever rested. Now, the reason for the executor's assent, is as strong in the case of a bequest of freedom as in any other. Whether, metaphysically, we can with propriety call it a legacy, it is not important to consider. Practically, it is a withdrawal from the personal fund, destined by law for payment of debts, of a part of that fund; and there is the same necessity in this as in the case of other specific legacies, for establishing, either by the assent of the executor, or the settlement of his administration account before a proper and competent tribunal, that it is no longer necessary to retain the fund.

It was said, however, that the legislature has pointed out the only method in which emancipated slaves shall be subjected to the payment of the debts of their former owners: that they shall be "liable to be taken by execution to satisfy the antecedent debts" of such owner: and it is contended, that the executor has nothing to do with an emancipated slave; that he constitutes no part of the assets, and that he can only be reached by the direct execution of the creditor. These are novel doctrines, and though sustained with great ability, we must not rashly subscribe to them. It is not necessary, that I should at this time go into a full examination of them; as, owing to the absence of two of our brethren, the court cannot settle a new principle, or overthrow those which have been long established. Whenever we are called upon, imperatively, to pronounce upon them, 301 many grave *considerations will present themselves. We shall have to look to the possible effect of a change of the current of decisions upon slave rights, acquired by purchase from executors, even where their testator's estates have been overwhelmed with debt; we shall have to explain in what manner the creditor is to proceed, to get an execution against a slave, or to get a judgment against the executor, when that executor had no assets in his hands according to this system of opinions; we shall have to decide, whether it could have been intended to permit a dispersion of the slaves of a testator emancipated by his will, to the prejudice of his creditors, or to require that although it should be altogether clear that the debts would sweep the whole, there should be no sale of them to pay the debts except under the hammer; a proceeding equally injurious to the estate, and inhuman towards the slaves. We shall also have to enquire, whether it really could have been the design of the legislature, in 1782, when the emancipation act was first passed, altogether to exonerate slaves emancipated by the will from the payment of the testator's debts; for the provision expressly making emancipated slaves subject to the debts of the owner, contained in the 54th section of the statute concerning slaves, was not enacted till 1792. If then, emancipation is not to be considered, under the 5th section, as subordinate to the rights of the executor devolving upon him at the instant of the decedent's death, under the general principles of the common law, which postpone all the benevolences of the testator to his just debts, then there were ten years during which a man might by will have defrauded his creditors of their demands, by an universal emancipation of his slaves. It may at least be doubted, whether such was ever considered to be the intention of the law. Upon much reflection, and upon an examination of the case of Woodley v. Abby, 5 Call 336, which arose on an emancipation prior to the statute of 1792, I incline to think, that the proviso contained in the 54th section, was added to meet the case of emancipation by deed; slaves emancipated by will being 302 *considered, independently of that provision, as assets in the executor's hands, until his assent was given to the bequest of freedom.

I am, then, clearly of opinion, that the assent of the executor must be shewn in this case, to sustain the demand of the plaintiff.

But, upon a careful examination of the testimony, I think the jury would have been justified in inferring that assent from the facts proved. The proofs not as full, indeed, as could be wished; but it certainly establishes the right of the slave to recover his freedom by bill in equity; and I would not, therefore, require as rigorous proof as might otherwise be demanded. From the testimony in the cause, it might well and fairly have been argued, that the estate was amply sufficient to pay the debts, without charging the slaves; that the executor knew this; that knowing it, he assented at once to the emancipation of four who had then attained the proper age: that this assent to the freedom of four of the slaves is perhaps an assent to that of the rest; that if Nicholas had, at that time, been of the proper age, he would have expressly assented to his freedom; that a design to enslave him tortiously forever, could not have been fairly inferred against a man, who had so promptly manifested a just design to carry the will into execution; that when he was taken by execution, he had still some time to serve; that he was a negro man in the prime of life; and that having sold for the insignificant sum of 135 dollars, it was fair to presume he was not sold for life, but only for his remaining term of service. The testimony, that the executor stated the title to be good, except so far as it was questioned by a particular claimant, being the testimony of the demurrant, cannot weigh against these inferences: and the jury might have concluded, without doing violence to the evidence in the cause, that the residue of Nicholas's term alone was sold, and that it was so understood at the time of the sale. If so, those facts would amount to an assent on the part of the executor, and establish his right to freedom, which could *not be divested by the levy of the creditor's execution; Burnley v. Lambert, 1 Wash. 308.

Debt on Judgment—Statute of Limitations—Effect as to Forthcoming Bond.—The statute of limitations, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 5, whereby the remedy on a judgment by debt or scire facias is limited to ten years, is no bar to a motion on a forthcoming bond of more than ten years standing.

Forthcoming Bond—When Has Force of a Judgment.*

—It seems, that a forthcoming bond has not the force of a judgment, till it is returned forfeited and filed in the clerk's office; and even after it is filed, it is only in a partial sense, that it has the force of a judgment before execution upon it is awarded.

B. Davis administratrix of R. Davis deceased, having, in July 1806, sued out a writ of fieri facias, upon a judgment recovered by her in the county court of King William, against R. Madison and T. Butler, and this execution having been duly levied by the sheriff on the property of Madison, he with M. Lipscomb his surety, gave a forthcoming bond dated the 8th July 1806, payable to the administratrix, for the forthcoming and delivery of the property at the day and place appointed for the sale thereof. The sheriff made return upon the execution, that he had levied it, and had taken a forthcoming bond, which had "not been complied with," but there had come to his hands a subpoena in chancery returnable to the ensuing August term of the county court, with an injunction to stay proceedings as to part of the debt.† Whether the forthcoming bond was returned with the execution, or not, did not appear.

304 *Henry Davis, the administrator of B. Davis the obligee in this bond, in 1826, gave a notice to the administrator of Lipscomb, the surety therein bound, of a motion to be made in the county court at its July term of that year, for an award of execution on the forthcoming bond. The motion was made accordingly; but the county court, being of opinion that recovery on the bond was barred by the statute of limitations, overruled it, and gave judgment for the defendant; from which the plaintiff appealed to the circuit court, which reversed the judgment, and remanded the cause to the county court, with directions, in substance, to disregard the bar of the statute of limitations. And then Lipscomb's administrator appealed to this court.

As the statute of executions, which authorizes the taking of forthcoming bonds for the delivery of property taken in execution at the day and place of sale (1 Rev.

Forthcoming Bond—When It Has the Force of a Judgment.—A forfeited forthcoming bond has the force of a judgment only from the time the bond was returned to the clerk's office. Cabell v. Given, 30 W. Va. 760, 5 S. E. Rep. 442, citing the principal case at page 770. See also, citing the principal case, Allen v. Hart, 18 Gratt. 734. See monographic notes on "Statutory Bonds" appended to Goolsby v. Strother, 21 Gratt. 107, and "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425.

†It appeared that this suit in chancery, and the injunction awarded therein, remained unnoticed by both of the parties and the court, till September term 1818, when the injunction was dissolved. But this fact was not regularly stated as part of the county court record; and in the view of the case taken by this court, was wholly immaterial.—Note in Original Edition.

Code, ch. 134, § 16, p. 530,) provides, that the sheriff shall return such bond, if forfeited, to the clerk of the court from which the execution issued, there to be safely kept, and to have the force of a judgment; and as the statute of limitations (Id. ch. 128, § 5, p. 489,) limits the remedy upon judgments, by scire facias or action of debt, to ten years; the question discussed at the bar, was, whether the motion on this forthcoming bond was barred by the statute?

TUCKER, P. This case turns upon the question, whether the 5th section of the statute of limitations applies to motions upon forthcoming bonds. For although, if no reason had been assigned for the judgment, we must have affirmed it, as there is no bill of exceptions, yet as the county court rests its decision upon the statute of limitations, it must be reversed if there be no part of that statute applicable to the case. It is contended to be within the 5th section relating to judgments.

305 *The statute of executions, it is true, provides that the officer taking a forthcoming bond shall return it to the clerk's office, to be there safely kept, and to have the force of a judgment. The filing previous to the motion, is not indeed essential to it, Eppes's ex'ors v. Colley, 2 Munf. 523, but the bond must be filed when the judgment is given, and until filed, it will not, I presume, have the force of a judgment. Were it otherwise, these newly created judgments, instead of being deposited in a fixed and known office, for examination and as notice to all concerned, would be ambulatory in the pockets of the plaintiffs or the sheriffs, to the great prejudice of executors and administrators, who must look to them as debts of superior dignity, and to the entrapping of purchasers of the lands of the debtor, or his sureties, which would be overreached by these judgments in abmuscade. I am inclined, therefore, to think, that the bond can only have the force of a judgment after it has been filed; and as this bond does not appear to have been filed until the motion, the statute could not even have commenced running, when the court admitted it to be a bar of the demand. When execution has been awarded, then indeed the case is within the principle, and perhaps within the letter of the statute; and if the plaintiff omits to take out execution for ten years, his remedy is gone forever.

Admitting, however, that the bond has, to some intents, the force of a judgment as soon as it is filed, I think it obvious, that it has not all the effect of a judgment until there has been an award of execution. No execution can be sued on it, at the mere will of the party; the authority of the court must first be obtained by motion. And even after the lapse of a year, that authority may be obtained by motion. Moreover, it cannot be obtained by scire facias, but the motion and the action of debt are the only remedies. Then, again, though the statute gives to the bond the force of a judgment, still it looks upon it, until execution has been awarded, in a far different light. A judgment is certain, fixed and conclusive. It can

306 only be controverted *by a proceeding in error; and execution is accordingly awarded upon the demand of the party, without the authority or leave of the court. And, as he has this uncontrolled power to pursue his debtor by execution, a presumption of payment arises from his failure to do so. The forthcoming bond, on the other hand, is not final and conclusive. It was foreseen that these instruments, taken by ministerial officers, would be exceedingly liable to errors, and hence the intervention of the court was required, to ascertain the validity of this new species of judgment. No execution can issue upon it but on motion; for the regularity of the bond may be questioned, a performance of its conditions averred, even the execution of it denied. It has not, therefore, until the award of execution, the most important characteristics of a judgment. Nor does an equally strong presumption arise from the failure to move for an award of execution, as from a failure to sue out execution. To the latter there is no conceivable impediment. To the former there may be; as, for instance, the difficulty of finding the defendant, or his absence from the country, and the like; difficulties, which, if the case is within the 5th section of the statute of limitations, from no excuse for delay, since the bar of that section is absolute. There is yet another consideration: if a forthcoming bond be faulty, an action of debt may be brought upon it; which is clearly not within the statute. Has not the plaintiff the same right if the bond is good? If he chooses to bring debt upon the bond, for the purpose of holding his adversary to bail, instead of serving a notice on him, which might have the effect of a notice to abscond, could his right be denied? And if the action would lie, could it be barred by the 5th section of the statute, when the party has elected to consider the bond, as a common law bond, and not as a judgment? I should think not. And, upon the whole, I am well satisfied that this provision of the statute of limitations does not apply to a forthcoming bond before the award of execution. But when upon motion, execution is awarded, it ac-

307 quires all the *characteristics of a judgment, and from that moment is within the statute. The party can never after elect to consider it as a common law bond; he has fixed its character as a judgment; he can now take out execution at his pleasure. If he fails to do so within the year, he is driven to his scire facias; and if his failure continues for ten years, he is barred forever.

The other judges concurred. Judgment of the circuit court affirmed.

Circuit Superiour Courts of Law and Chancery—Jurisdiction.—The present circuit superiour courts of law and chancery have jurisdiction to correct mistakes in judgments of the former circuit courts of law—Held, in Garland v. Marx reported in a note.

There were four cases between these parties, on writs of supersedeas to judgments of the circuit court of Amherst, which being nearly alike in their circumstances, were argued and considered together.

Eubank and two others executed four bonds to Caleb Ralls, all dated the 20th December 1817, and all for the same penal sum of 1548 dollars, with condition, respectively, for the payment of 774 dollars, on 309 or before the 1st day of *March in the years 1818, 1819, 1820 and 1821. On each of these bonds, there was an indorsement in these words: "Memorandum—If the within bond is discharged within thirty days after due, no interest will be required; if not, interest from the date;" which was signed and sealed by the obligee and obligors. The witnesses to the execution of the bonds, were different from those to the execution of the memorandums.

1st case. In 1819, an action was brought by Ralls against the three obligors, in the county court of Amherst, on the first bond payable the 1st March 1818. The declaration claimed the penalty, without taking notice of the condition or memorandum indorsed. The defendants appeared, and pleaded payment, but afterwards relinquished the plea; whereupon, at November term 1819, the following entry was made on the minute book of the court—"Plea waived, and judgment for specialty and costs." But the judgment, as entered at large on the order book by the clerk, was for the penal sum of 1548 dollars, to be discharged by the payment of 774 dollars with interest from the 20th December 1817, the date of the bond (according to the memorandum), instead of the 1st March 1818, the day of payment appointed in the condition. Upon the judgment as entered in the order book giving interest from the 20th December 1817, a fieri facias was sued out, and levied on the property of the defendants; a forthcoming bond taken in exact pursuance of the execution; the forthcoming bond forfeited; execution awarded thereupon for the debt and interest as computed in the bond; and execution sued out, and returned by the sheriff satisfied. But whether the money was paid over by the sheriff to the plaintiff, did not appear.

2nd case. An action was brought by Ralls's executor, id 1819, in the county court of Amherst, on the second bond payable on the 1st March 1819. In this case too, the declaration claimed the penalty, without taking notice of the condition or memorandum. The defendants did not appear, and judgment by default for want of appearance, was entered 310 *against them by the clerk in the office, and at November term 1819 confirmed; which office judgment confirmed, as entered at large, was for the penalty, to be discharged by the payment of 774 dollars with interest from the 20th December 1817, the date of the bond, instead of the 1st March 1819, when the money was due according to the condition. And upon this judgment there was the same process of execution as in the first case, and the execution on the forthcoming bond was returned satisfied; but it did not appear, whether or no this money had been paid over by the sheriff to the plaintiff.

3rd case. An action was brought in the county court of Amherst, in 1821, by Pullet Sandige assignee of Caleb Ralls, on the fourth bond payable on the 1st March 1821. In this case the declaration claimed the penalty with interest from the date of the bond. The defendants appeared, and pleaded payment, but afterwards relinquished their plea; whereupon, at May term 1822, the following entry was made on the minute book of the court—"Plea waived and judgment for specialty and costs." But the judgment as entered at large on the order book by the clerk, was for the penalty, to be discharged by the payment of 774 dollars with interest from the 20th December 1817, the date of the bond, instead of the 1st March 1821, the day appointed in where there is a collection of authorities on this subject. On this question, the principal case is also cited in Shelton v. Welsh, 7 Leigh 177; Saunders v. Lipscomb, 90 Va. 652, 19 S. E. Rep. 450; Shadrack v. Woolfolk, 32 Gratt. 714.

The proceeding to correct such errors is by motion to the court in which they occurred. Snead v. Coleman, 7 Gratt. 306, citing Eubank v. Ralls, 4 Leigh 208; Shelton v. Welsh, 7 Leigh 175; Digges v. Dunn, 1 Munf. 56. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Goolsby v. St. John, 25 Gratt. 157. Execution on Erroneous Judgment—Reversal—Restitution.—For the proposition that, where execution has been levied and returned satisfied, on a judgment which is erroneous and afterwards reversed or corrected, restitution cannot be awarded, unless it appear that the money has been paid to the plaintiff, the principal case is cited in Erskine v. Henry, 6 Leigh 385; Fawkes v. Davison, 8 Leigh 560.

the condition for the payment. There was a feri facias sued out on this judgment also, and levied, a forthcoming bond given and forfeited, and an award of execution thereupon; but what, or whether there were any, proceedings afterwards had in this case, did not certainly appear.

In August 1826, Eubank and others gave notice to Ralls's executor, of motions to be by them made in the two first cases, and to Sandige, the assignee of Ralls, of a motion in the third case, at the ensuing November term of the county court, to amend and correct the record of the three judgments respectively, so as to make the first a judgment for the debt with interest from the 1st March 1818, the day of pay-

311 the first bond, instead of the 20th December 1817, the date of the bond; and the second, likewise, a judgment for the debt with interest only from the 1st March 1819, when it was payable; and the third, a judgment for the debt with interest only from the 1st March 1821, when it was payable. The motions were accordingly made; and upon the hearing of them, the county court,—considering that the judgments had been erroneously entered by the clerk through mistake, for the several debts with interest from the 20th December 1817, the date of the bonds, instead of interest only from the dates appointed in the several conditions thereof for the payment of the money, according to what the court held to be the true construction and legal effect of the obligations,—ordered the records to be amended and corrected, respectively, as proposed by Eubank and others; and, moreover, ordered the forthcoming bonds, and the executions sued out thereon, and returned satisfied, in the two first cases, and the forthcoming bond in the last case, to be quashed. From these orders Ralls's executor and Sandige, respectively, appealed to the circuit court; which, holding that the question arising on the bonds and the memorandums indorsed thereon (the question, namely, whether the dates from which the debts should bear interest, ought to be ascertained by the conditions of the bonds, or by the memorandums indorsed on them) was of a judicial nature, and, therefore, that the errors complained of were not clerical mistakes, which the county court could correct,—reversed the judgments of the county court, and overruled the motions. And then Eubank and others applied to this court for writs of supersedeas to the judgments of the circuit court; which were allowed.

4th case. Upon the third of the bonds payable the 1st March 1820, a suit was brought very shortly after the debt fell due, by Sandige as assignee thereof, in the circuit court of Amherst. In this case, as in the two first, the declaration claimed the penalty, without taking any notice of the condition or memorandum indorsed.

312 The defendants did not appear, and judgment by default was entered by the clerk, and confirmed September term 1820; which office judgment confirmed, as entered at large, was for the penalty to be discharged by the payment of 774 dollars, with interest from the 20th December 1817, the date of the bond, instead of the 1st March 1820, the day of payment appointed in the condition. But it did not distinctly appear, whether the office judgment was entered at large on the order book, on the last day of the term, and signed among the other orders by the judge, or whether it was entered at or after the term, as of the last day thereof, without being signed by the judge. On this judgment there was the same process of execution as in the two first cases, and the execution on the forthcoming bond was returned satisfied; but it did not appear that the sheriff had paid the money to the plaintiff.

In January 1827, Eubank and others gave notice to Sandige, of a motion to be made at the ensuing April term of the circuit court, to amend and correct the record of the office judgment, so as to make it a judgment for the debt with interest only from the 1st March 1820, the day of payment appointed by the condition of the bond, instead of the 20th December, the date thereof. The motion was made; and the judge, upon the hearing, being of opinion that the error complained of was not a clerical mistake, but a judicial error, which could be corrected only by an appellate court, overruled it. To this judgment also, this court, on the petition of Eubank and others, allowed a supersedeas.

The causes were argued here by Stanard for the plaintiffs in error, and by Johnson for the defendants.

I. The first question was, whether the original judgments were wrong, in giving the bank interest from the date of the bonds, which the memorandums indorsed thereon provided should be paid, in case the debts were not punctually paid at the dates appointed in the condition?

Stanard said two of the judgments were entered on the minute book of the county court (which was the record) 313 *for the debts due by the specialties, and costs; the other two were office judgments and of course ought properly to have been for the debts appearing due by the bonds, and costs. In entering the judgments at large, the clerk ought to have conformed with the legal construction and effect of the obligations, and instead of giving back interest from the date thereof, should have given interest only from the days of payment appointed in the conditions. The back interest provided for in the memorandums, was in the nature of a penalty. Waller v. Long, 6 Munf. 61.

Johnson questioned the correctness of the adjudication in Waller v. Long; but he endeavoured to distinguish this case from that, because, he said, it was to be inferred, from the circumstance of the subscribing witnesses to the execution of the memorandums, not being the same persons who attested the execution of the bonds, that the memorandums were new contracts entered into at a different and subsequent date.

II. The next question was, whether supposing the judgments wrong in giving the back interest, it was an error of the court, which could only be corrected by an appellate tribunal, or a clerical mistake which the same court might properly correct, on motion or writ of error coram nobis?

On this question, Stanard cited Commonwealth v. Winstons, 5 Rand. 546, and Garland v. Marx,* which, he said, were in point to shew that the errors complained of here, were clerical mistakes, amendable by the same court on motion.

Johnson on the other hand, contended that the errors complained of here, were, in their nature, judicial errors of the court, involving too a very doubtful point of law, which, therefore, could only be corrected by an appellate court. He cited Bent v. Patten, 1 Rand. 25, and argued, that the cases at bar fell within the principle of that case, and were distinguishable from the cases of Commonwealth v. Winstons and Garland v. Marx.

314 *III. Johnson insisted, that the motions to amend, in the 1st, 2nd and 4th cases, wherein final judgments were entered more than five years before notice given by the appellants of their motions to correct the alleged errors, were barred by the statute of limitations, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 19, p. 492.† This objection presented the general question, whether writs of error coram nobis, or motions, to correct clerical mistakes in proceedings in the same court, were within the statute? But Stanard also maintained, that whether the statute embraced such cases or no, it could not be relied on here, because it had not been pleaded in the court below.

IV. The last point was, Whether the county court, after correcting the errors as to the back interest, and quashing the executions on which the debts with the excess of interest had been levied, ought not to have proceeded further, and awarded restitution?

TUCKER, P. There being, in these four cases, only one or two minor points of difference, I shall consider them, as they have been argued, all together.

The first question is common to them all; and after having carefully considered it, I am satisfied that the case of Waller v. Long is decisive upon the point. I shall, therefore, dismiss it without further remark.

The provision, then, exacting interest in default of punctual payment, being in the nature of a penalty, and to be disregarded accordingly, it is clear there is error somewhere in those proceedings. It seems to have been somewhat questioned, whether the error was in the entry of the judgment, and so proper to be amended upon motion; or in the 315 *execution, and so to be corrected upon a motion to quash. I do not think it important; for though the notice is to amend and not to quash, yet it gave sufficient information of the plaintiff's object to justify either motion. I am, moreover, of opinion, that the proper motion was to amend. For it appears, that when this motion was made, the complete record, made up from the minutes, was erroneous in the point in question: with this the execution corresponded; and, of course the execution could not be quashed, until, the record itself was corrected. So that, although the judgment of the court upon the minutes, was correct, the record of the judgment, as entered at large, which it was sought to amend, was erroneous, and was the proper object of correction.

Was this error amendable upon motion? or was it such an error in law, as can be only amended by writ of error from a superiour tribunal? There seems to have been some difficulty, in drawing the line between clerical errors, and errors in law or in the judgment of the court. I am not, at this time, prepared to say that it can or cannot be distinctly defined a priori. But this, at least, may safely be affirmed, that from the english statute of 14 Ed. 3, stat. 1, ch. 6, which is said to have been the first statute of amendment, down to our statute of 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 108, p. 512, the legislative will has leaned to the amendment of mere misprisions, without the necessity of encountering the expense and trouble of a writ of error. Such is obviously the policy evinced in this last statute. The principles of the common law inhibited the allowance of a writ of error in the same court in which the judgment was rendered, for any error in the judgment of the court itself; for, if that were allowed, it would be infinite. But where the error was in the process, or a misprision of the clerk, it might be corrected by the same court, without involving inconsistency, or leading to endless contests about what the record ought to be. In this spirit, the statute of 1819, above quoted, not 316 confining itself to clerical errors, or errors in the process, or to the *mere ministerial acts of the officer of the court, extends to the very judgment of the court itself: it provides, that "where, in the record of the judgment, there shall be any mistake &c. and among the records of the proceedings, there shall be any verdict, bond, bill, note or other writing of the like nature or kind, whereby such judgment may be safely amended, the court in which such judgment shall be rendered, shall amend it according to the very right of the case." Here, it is clearly manifested, that though the error be in the judgment itself, if there appears to have been a mistake in it, it shall be amended. Thus, if a verdict be rendered for £100. and the judgment on it entered for 100 dollars, there is an obvious mistake, which may be corrected under the statute of 1819, by the verdict, to which it may be fairly presumed the court designed to conform. This statute, I think, relieves us from much of the former difficulty in relation to the distinction between clerical errors and errors in the judgment of the court. For, if it appears, that there is a mere mistake, miscalculation or misrecital, the statute is imperative, that the correction shall be made. But if, upon the inspection of the proceeding, the matter complained of appears to have proceeded from error in the opinion of the court, and not from mere mistake, the case is not within the statute:

*Reported in a note at the end of this case.

†The words of the statute are—"No writ of error or supersedeas shall be granted to any judgment of a court of law, after the expiration of five years from the time when such judgment shall have been made final: saving to all persons non compos mentis, infants, femes covert, imprisoned, or out of the U. States in the service thereof or of this state, three years after their several disabilities removed."—Note in Original Edition.

for the mistake, whether of the clerk or of the judge, to which the statute refers, is not an error of judgment, but an error in which the judgment has no participation.

Since this statute, then, I conceive, there are two classes of errors amendable by the same court in which the judgment is rendered: 1. all such errors as were deemed clerical, or were amendable before the act; and 2. all such mistakes even in the judgment of the court, as can be amended by any verdict, bond, note, or bill &c. in the record.

The wisdom of the statute, and the policy of construing it according to its spirit, is very obvious, when we look to the consequence of permitting mere mistakes to be amendable only by writ of error from 317 an appellate tribunal. The *expense of the proceeding, the tying up a just demand for a long time, for an error which the inferior court would itself acknowledge the instant it was pointed out, the accumulation of appeals in this court, and the consequent increase of the evil of delay, all conspire to sustain the propriety of leaving the inferior courts to correct whatever is merely referable to mistake, and of confining the powers of the appellate courts to those errors which cannot properly be revised by the tribunal which has committed them, because it had deliberately committed them. I am happy, therefore, to find that the three judges who sat in Commonwealth v. Winstons, 5 Rand. 546, concur in the explicit admission, that the statute of 1819 comprehends the mistakes of the court as well as those committed by the clerk.

Was there, in the cases before us, a mere clerical mistake? or was there an error in the judgment of the court?

First, as to the cases in the county court. One of these is the case of an office judgment, confirmed for specialty and costs. In the other two, the entry on the minute book is, "Plea waived and judgment for specialty and costs." All of these are strictly correct and justified the clerk when he should extend the minutes, and make up the complete record from them, in entering the judgment for the penalty in the respective specialties, to be discharged by the payment of the sum due with interest, not from the 20th December 1817, the date of the bonds, but from the respective times of payment. Up to the judgment then, inclusive, there was no error. The error is since the judgment, in its extension by the clerk in the complete record. Now this extension was strictly a clerical act, and was therefore amendable even independent of the statute of 1819.

Then, as to the judgment of the circuit court. In that case, there was an office judgment entered erroneously for interest from the 20th December 1817, instead of the 1st March 1820. Now, I take it, this was clearly amendable by the circuit court, under another provision of the statute, 1

Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 77, that "the 318 court shall have *control over all proceedings in the office during the preceding vacation, may correct any mistakes or errors which may have happened therein, and may for good cause shewn, set aside any of the rules or proceedings, and make such order concerning the same as may be just and right." Why? because these are clerical proceedings merely. The office judgment, therefore, though entered by the clerk, might have been corrected by the court. It was not however corrected; and not being set aside at the succeeding term, the clerk seems to have proceeded according to the provisions of the statute of 1792 (1 Old Rev. Code, ch. 66, § 42; Pleasants's edi. p. 80), and to have entered the judgment at large, either actually on the last day of the term, or as of the last day of the term, which, under that statute, would have sufficed; Digges's ex'or v. Dunn's ex'or, 1 Munf. 56. I do not think it clearly appears, whether it was actually entered among the orders signed by the judge or not. Suppose it was, yet the judgment so entered was not the act of the court; it was a ministerial act of the clerk, in obedience to the express command of a statute no longer in force. It may be doubted how far the court, even under that statute, could have entered a judgment, variant in a single title, from the office judgment, unless that judgment was either set aside, or a motion made to correct it. But under the act of 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 79, the matter is still more clear. That directs, that office judgments not set aside during the term, shall be "considered as final judgments of the last day of the term." It does not pursue the statute of 1792, in requiring them to be entered as of the last day of the term. Therefore, they do not now pass at all under the supervision of the court, nor are they entered upon the record. Hence, the entry of the judgment is still the mere act of the clerk, and as such amendable. For the law considers the erroneous entry of the office judgment, as a mere misprision of his, and authorizes the court to amend it. Now, if it was his misprision originally, we have the authority of 319 judge Cabell, in his very *elaborate and most able opinion in Commonwealth v. Winstons, for saying that what was a mere misprision of the clerk in its origin, does not cease to be so, even where the entry has been read in court and signed by the judge; much less where he has nothing to do with it.

Upon the whole, therefore, I am of opinion, that the error in all these cases was amendable.

The other questions discussed in this case, seem to me to present no difficulty. The record of the judgments in all the cases, being erroneous, and the executions corresponding therewith, the former was very properly made the point of attack. But it was a necessary consequence of the correction of the record of the judgments, that the executions should be quashed, whatever may have been the proceedings under them. Nor was there any bar to the motion arising from the statute of limitations of writs of error and supersedeas, for that act if it applies to writs of error coram nobis, or to motions of the nature of them, was neither pleaded nor relied on in the court below. If it had been, the party might have brought himself within some one of the exceptions.

As to a writ of restitution, which this court is asked to award, as being part of the judgment which the courts below ought to have given, I am of opinion, that nothing appears in this case, to warrant such a judgment below. In those cases in which a levy appears to have been made, there is no evidence that the money was paid to the plaintiff. The sheriff does not so return. It seems to me, therefore, to be one of those cases in which the writ of restitution after reversal can only be awarded upon the party's suing out his scire facias, or perhaps upon a notice specially stating that a motion for restitution would be made. It is said in Tidd's Practice, p. 1072, that when the plaintiff has execution, and the money is levied and paid, and the judgment is reversed, the party shall have restitution without a scire facias; because it appears on the record, that the money is paid, and there is a certainty 320 of what was lost; otherwise, *where it was levied, but not paid, for then there must be a scire facias, suggesting the matter of fact, viz. the sum levied &c. This is the language of the case in 2 Salk. 588. See also 2 Wms. Saund. 101, y; 6 Com. Dig. Plead. 3, B. 20, p. 466. I understand it as meaning, that the money must have been paid over to the plaintiff; for if it is yet in the hands of the sheriff, it seems not reasonable that there should be judgment for the amount against the plaintiff. He neither has the money nor can he recover it; for his remedies against the sheriff [in England] are either by rule, by action of debt on the return, or by action of assumpsit for money had and received, neither of which could be pursued by him, I presume, after his judgment is reversed, or his execution quashed for irregularity. On the other hand, there could be no difficulty on the part of the defendant. He might compel restitution from the sheriff (if he had not paid over the money) either by scire facias or by rule: for he is certainly entitled to it, and the court would compel the officer, if the money was yet in his hands, to pay it to the proper person, or if it had been paid into court, according to the exigency of the execution, it would be paid to the defendant by its order. I am, therefore, of opinion, that there should be no award of restitution by this court, but the party may proceed below by rule against the sheriff, or the plaintiff, as the case may be, to recover back the excess he may have been compelled to pay on the executions.

CARR, J. Agreeing with the general propositions of the president, and the conclusions to which he comes in the main, I should not have said anything in the case, but to prevent the inference (which might be drawn from my silence) that I consider the case of Commonwealth v. Winstons as overruling Bent v. Patten. I am pretty sure, that such was not the intention of my brethren, and know it was not my own. We considered the cases distinguishable; as I also think Bent v. Patten dis- 321 tinguishable from the cases *now before us; and without saying that I should have gone with the majority in that case, I mean simply to declare that I do not consider myself as overruling it. I think the errors in the cases before us clearly clerical, and properly amendable by the same court in which the judgments were entered. I consider the executions and all proceedings on them properly quashed, after correcting the judgments. But I do not think this court can award restitution, as there is no return shewing that the money has been paid to the plaintiffs.

CABELL, J., concurred in opinion, that the judgments of the circuit court were erroneous.

In the first three cases, judgments of the circuit court reversed, and those of the county court affirmed—in the last case, judgment of the circuit court reversed, and judgment entered to amend the record of the office judgment, and to quash the execution and proceedings thereon.*

*The case of Garland v. Marx. (referred to in the argument of this case) ruled March 1832, was thus: Debt, in the circuit court of law of Amherst (under the statute concerning foreign bills of exchange, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 2, p. 485, and the act of incorporation of the Farmers' bank, 2 Id. ch. 100, § 15, clause 18, p. 90) by Joseph Marx against Gustavus Rose, the maker, and John Rose and David Garland, the indorsers, of a promissory note negotiable at the Farmers' bank for 2150 dollars. The capias was returned executed on John Rose and Garland, but as to Gustavus Rose that he was no inhabitant; whereupon it was ordered that the suit should abate as to him. The declaration was as usual, against all three defendants, but the proceedings were only against the two on whom the process had been served. These two defendants appeared and pleaded to issue, and there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff; but in the caption of the judgment entered in the order book, the case, through inadvertence, was stated as one between Joseph Marx, plaintiff, and Gustavus Rose, John Rose and David Garland, defendants; so that the judgment appeared in the entry as a judgment against all three defendants, though the suit had abated as to Gustavus Rose. Garland appealed from the judgment, and gave an appeal bond, the condition of which recited the judgment according to its caption in the order book, as one against Gustavus Rose, John Rose and David Garland. While the appeal was pending in this court, Marx moved the circuit superior court of law and chancery of Amherst, to correct and amend the entry of 322 the judgment, so as to make it a judgment against John Rose and Garland only: and the court ordered the amendment accordingly. And then, Marx, the appellee, moved this court for a rule to dismiss the appeal, unless another and a proper appeal bond should be given by the appellant,—upon the ground, that as the condition of the appeal bond taken in the circuit court of law, recited the judgment as one against three defendants, when in truth it was a judgment against only two, the bond was therefore naught, and no suit could be maintained on it, in case the judgment should be affirmed.

In the argument of this motion, by Johnson for the appellee, and Stanard for the appellant, two points were made: 1. Whether the error in the judgment was a clerical one, such as the circuit court of law, if it still existed, would have been competent to amend, on motion, at a term subsequent to that at which it was entered? and 2. Whether, since the new organization of the judicial system, by the statute of April 1831, Sess. Acts of 1830-31, ch. 11, p. 42, it was competent for the circuit superior court of law and chancery, to amend such an error in the entry of a judgment of the former circuit court of law?

TUCKER, P. The judgment in the court below, in this case, having been corrected upon motion, in a point in which it was confessedly erroneous, and that correction producing a variance between the judgment as amended and the recital of the judgment in the appeal bond, it is apprehended there would be a fatal objection to a recovery upon the bond. That it would be so, there is no doubt. The counsel for the appellee, therefore, considering the appeal as now depending without an appeal bond, in effect, asks a rule to dismiss the appeal, unless the appellant shall enter into a new bond corresponding with the judgment as it now stands amended. To this rule various objections have been presented.

1. It is denied, that the present circuit superior court of law and chancery had jurisdiction to amend any error, upon motion, in the judgment of the former circuit court of law. We cannot accede to this opinion. The statute of 1830-31, ch. 11, § 55, Sess. Acts, p. 60, provides, that all judgments of the former circuit courts of law, which remain wholly or in part unexecuted, shall be executed by the respective circuit superior courts of those counties wherein the court was held, by which the same may have been rendered. The present circuit superior court, then, has jurisdiction to proceed to execute this yet unexecuted judgment. It has jurisdiction over the case. It would be going far to say, that it has the power to execute the said judgment, on the part of the plaintiff, and yet it is without jurisdiction to act upon that judgment, as justice requires, on the part of the defendant. The jurisdiction to execute the judgment, carries with it the right to exercise the accustomed powers of the court over the judgment, in adjusting the rights of the parties. But again: The new courts are invested with jurisdiction over all causes arising within their respective jurisdictions, which were cognizable in the circuit courts of law formerly existing. Id. § 23, p. 48. Now, the former circuit courts of law had jurisdiction to correct this error, if it was a clerical error, upon "motion. Therefore, the 323 present court has that power. Nay more; upon the attempt of the plaintiff to enforce this judgment, a cause of action would at once arise on the part of the defendants, to correct any error in it by the ordinary means of a motion or writ of error coram nobis. We think, therefore, there is no doubt on this point.

2. It is said, this is not a clerical error, and, therefore, the circuit superior court of law and chancery had not a right to correct it; and if so, that we must consider it as if it had not been corrected, and then the bond will not vary from the judgment, and so no new bond will be necessary. The line of distinction is not very clearly marked, between clerical errors and errors in the judgment of the court; nor will the court, in this case attempt to define it. The court is of opinion, upon an inspection of this record, that the error here must be considered as clerical. The writ as to Gustavus Rose had been returned no inhabitant; and the suit was therefore abated as to him. The declaration was indeed against all three, but all the proceedings were, as they ought to have been, against the two on whom the writ was returned executed. They only gave bail; they only could plead; they only did plead; the issue was joined as to them only; the verdict was against them only. Then came the erroneous entry of the judgment; in which the name of Gustavus Rose was inserted, by mistake, in the caption of the entry. His name is not found in the entry itself; yet as the words "the said defendants" are found there, they refer, in strictness, to the names in the caption; and herein consisted the error. That this error was not actually in the judgment of the court, cannot be denied; for Gustavus Rose had been out of the cause, ever since the return of the writ, and all the proceedings had been against the other two defendants only. There is nothing to constitute it, technically, an error in the judgment of the court, against the obvious and real state of the facts. The case of Wren v. Thomson, 4 Munf. 380, establishes no such proposition. If we take the facts of that case,—not as the statement of the reporter gives them, but as the court considered them (however erroneously), there could be no doubt the error there, was not clerical. The court said "the facts in the record prove that the appellant was a defendant in both actions. The declarations include him as a defendant in the suits. The record states that he appeared by counsel and pleaded; the recognizance of special bail includes him, and it cannot be presumed without his consent; the judgments of the court include him;" for the judgments were against the defendants expressly, in the plural number, which must have included the appellant, as there was only one other party besides himself. It is very true, that as to one of the cases, the court seems to have mistaken the facts. If the reporter has not grossly misstated them; for he says, that, in that case, there was no plea filed or appearance entered, except that the defendant on whom the writ was executed in proper person came and acknowledged the plaintiff's action; which could not have justified the judgment against the other, on whom it was ordered not to be served; Ward v. Johnson, 1 Munf. 45. But the law of the case taken upon the state of facts supposed by the court, was doubtless settled very correctly. It presented a matter for correction by writ of error in law, not by motion or writ of error coram nobis.

324 "The correction of the error. In the present case, having thus been regular, and the appeal bond thereby vacated, because it does not now correspond with the existing judgment, the question is, What is now to be done? I have had strong doubts, and still have, whether we ought to take up the case piecemeal, and decide upon the character of this entry before we look into the whole record. If that were so, then there could be no new appeal bond required, until the court was ready to pronounce upon the whole case, and then it would be unnecessary, and the requisition frivolous. But my brethren are of opinion, that the question presented by this motion, should be decided before we take up the whole case. Acquiescing (though with strong doubts) in this, it follows, that another appeal bond must be given. At present there is no bond, and the appellant cannot have a right to take the chances of success, and indeed of delay, without giving the assurance required by law, of his performing the judgment of this court.

As to the form of the bond, there is no difficulty. It must recite, that the party had appealed from the judgment as it now stands amended, and must bind him to prosecute his appeal with effect and pay the condemnation of the court in case of affirmation; precisely as he would do, if the appeal were now for the first time granted. Thus, he will be liable to damages. I conceive, not only from the date of such bond, but from the time of his original appeal. For, if it should turn out that there is no other error than that of form which has been corrected, the law prescribes, that the judgment shall be affirmed; and that affirmation must be attended by the usual consequences,—costs and damages. And this is precisely in conformity with the design of the statute, which intended to discourage expensive appeals to this court where the party might have had redress in the court below. But if substantial error appears, then the reversal of the judgment will absolve the party from the damages and costs.

The rule is to be made absolute—allowing the appellant reasonable time to execute and file the new appeal bond.—Note in Original Edition.

325 *Marsteller and Wife and Others v. Coryell.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Demurrer to Evidence*—Inferences—Case at Bar.—On the trial of an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, brought by the heirs of R. A., the defendant demurs to the plaintiffs' evidence; and, by the evidence stated in the demurrer, it appears, that R. A. died seized; there is no positive proof, that the plaintiffs, his heirs, ever entered after his death; but there is proof, that the defendant's possession did not commence till a year after R. A.'s death: Held, that, on this evidence in a demurrer to evidence, it may fairly be inferred, that R. A.'s heirs entered into possession immediately upon their ancestor's death; and that, therefore, they are entitled to recover.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the district court held at Hay Market, rendered in May 1808. The cause had remained in this court, neglected by the parties, ever since until this term.

It was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, brought by Marsteller and wife and others against Coryell, for a trespass on a half acre lot of land in the town of Alexandria. The defendant pleaded the general issue. And upon the trial, he demurred to the evidence of the plaintiffs, who joined in the demurrer.

The evidence, set out at large in the demurrer, shewed, That the title of the lot in question was originally vested in the trustees of the town of Alexandria, and that they, by deed dated the 13th May 1765, conveyed the same to James M'Leod. That James M'Leod, by a verbal contract, sold the lot to one Joseph Watson, and put him in possession, but made no conveyance thereof. That Watson, by verbal contract likewise, sold it to Edward Rigdon and put him in possession; Rigdon died in 1772, having by his will devised this lot to his widow Elizabeth Rigdon; who sold it, by verbal contract, and delivery of possession, to Richard Arell. That, in the meantime, James M'Leod had died, leaving Robert M'Leod his son and heir at law; and that Robert M'Leod, by deed dated the 15th

September 1784, conveyed the lot to 326 Arell. That Arell continued to hold possession during his life, and died in actual possession, leaving the plaintiffs his heirs at law. And that the defendant entered upon the lot about a year after Arell's death. This was the trespass complained of. There was no evidence to shew, that Arell's heirs ever actually entered upon the premises after his death; nor any evidence to shew in whom the actual possession was, or that any one was in actual possession, during the interval between the death of Arell, and the taking of possession by the defendant.

Verdict for the plaintiffs for 1230 dollars, subject to the opinion of the court, on the demurrer to evidence, whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover in this action? The court held that they were not, and gave judgment for the defendant; from which the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

Botts and Briggs, for the appellee.

TUCKER, P. The trustees of the town of Alexandria conveyed the premises in question to James M'Leod, who died leaving Robert M'Leod his heir at law; he conveyed to Richard Arell, who died leaving the plaintiffs his heirs at law. Thus, the title is complete. Arell had received possession from a purchaser by verbal contract under James M'Leod, held possession for many years, without interruption, till his death, and died in possession. Coryell took possession a year afterwards; which was the trespass complained of. The point on which the district court decided the cause, was, doubtless, that there was no entry by Arell's heirs after his death; for until entry, the heir cannot maintain trespass against an intruder. But, as there is proof that Arell died in possession, we think that, on a demurrer to evidence, an actual possession in his heirs eo instante that he died, may fairly be presumed; and, therefore, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover in this action.

Judgment reversed, and judgment entered for the appellants.

327 *Janey's Ex'or v. Latane and Others.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Charitable Bequests—Validity*—Case at Bar.—Testator bequeaths to the school commissioners and their successors of South Farnham district, Essex county, for the schooling of the poor children of that district, 1000 dollars, to be put out at interest, and the interest only to be applied for the schooling of said poor children: there are school commissioners of the county of Essex, and testator was one of them at his death, but they are not a corporate body; there are no school commissioners of South Farnham district, nor any such district, that being only the name of an ancient parish: HELD, the bequest is void.

Joseph Janey, by his last will and testament, bequeathed as follows: "I give to the school commissioners and their successors of South Farnham district, Essex county, for the schooling of the poor children of that district, 1000 dollars, to be put out at interest at six per centum per annum, and the interest only to be applied for the schooling of said poor children."

Henry Latane and five others, exhibited their bill in chancery against Thomas Gresham the executor of Janey, in the circuit superior court of Essex, exhibiting Janey's will, and alleging, that they, together with the testator Janey in his lifetime, has been duly appointed school commissioners for the county of Essex, by the county court, in September 1831; that they and Janey had acted as such during his life, and the plaintiffs were still in office, performing the duties prescribed by law; that Essex county had been laid off into two districts, one called St. Ann's and the other South Farnham; and that the testator, Janey, had acted as school commissioner, with the plaintiffs, in the south Farnham district, from the date of his appointment till his death, the testator residing in South Farnham, and the plaintiffs in St. Ann's; and praying, that Janey's executor should be decreed to pay the legacy of 1000 dollars to the plaintiffs, to be by them appropriated according to the bequest.

328 *Gresham, the executor, in his answer, admitted the bequest in his testator's will, and that he had assets sufficient to pay the legacy; that the plaintiffs were, as they alleged, the surviving school commissioners for the county of Essex, duly appointed by the county court, and that his testator had been, in his lifetime, and continued till his death, one of the school commissioners for the county. But he denied, that the county had ever been, as the plaintiffs alleged, divided by the school commissioners, into two districts, according to the provisions of the statute of February 1829, to amend the several acts concerning the literary fund, though the county of Essex had anciently been divided into two parishes, called South Farnham and St. Ann's, the lines of which were still well known, and his testator in his lifetime resided in the former parish. And he insisted, that there was no such body of men, known to the law, as "the school commissioners and their successors of South Farnham district, Essex county;" and that the legacy to them in his testator's will, was void for uncertainty.

There was no replication to the answer; and the cause was heard, by consent, on the bill, the will therewith exhibited, and the answer: whereupon the court decreed,

*Charitable Bequests—Validity.—On this question, see discussion in foot-note to Gallego v. Attorney General. 3 Leigh 450. The principal case is cited in the following: Com. v. Levy, 23 Gratt. 40; Protestant Episcopal Ed. Soc. v. Churchman, 80 Va. 768; Wilson

v. Perry, 29 W. Va. 189. 1 S. E. Rep. 315; Wilmoth v. Wilmoth, 34 W. Va. 436, 12 S. E. Rep. 734; Pack v. Shanklin, 43 W. Va. 316, 37 S. E. Rep. 394.

See monographic note on "Charities" appended to Kelly v. Love, 20 Gratt. 124.

that the defendant should, out of the assets of his testator in his hands, pay the legacy of 1000 dollars to the plaintiffs. The defendant applied to this court for an appeal from the decree; which was allowed.

Johnson, or the appellant, said, that the statute of 1888-9, Supp. to Rev. Code, ch. 28, § 1, p. 40, authorized the school commissioners of any county, if they thought proper, to divide their county into districts, of not less than three nor more than seven square miles; but Essex county had never been so divided into districts; there was no such district as South Farnham, which was only the name of an ancient parish. There were not, and could not be, any school commissioners for South Farnham district; first, because there was no such district; and next, because, if there had been, 329 *the school commissioners never were, and could not be, appointed for a particular district, but always for the whole county, under the provisions of the general statute concerning the literary fund, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 33, § 13-19, p. 87-89. Neither were the school commissioners a body corporate: they had no law to govern them in the administration of any fund for the education of the poor, except that part of the literary fund, and the proceeds of glebe lands, dedicated by law to that object: so that, in the administration of private donations, they would be governed by no other law than that which would govern any other individuals. The school commissioners, in the administration of the fund committed to them by law, were to select objects from any part of their county, in their discretion. There was, he said, no legal method of ascertaining the "poor children of South Farnham district;" and this case fell within the principles on which the case of Gallego's ex'ors v. Atto. General was decided, 3 Leigh 450.

Briggs, for the appellees, said, it was true, that the school commissioners were not a body corporate, that they were appointed for the whole county, not for particular districts, and that Essex county might not have been formally divided into districts; but he thought it would be quite too technical, to disappoint the charity of the testator on such grounds. For, as he was, in his lifetime, one of the school commissioners, and died in the office, his very will shewed, that the county had been, in fact, divided into districts, and that he knew it; and, applying the words of the bequest to the known state of facts, his obvious purpose was, to give the legacy to the school commissioners of the whole county, to be appropriated to the education of the poor children of South Farnham district, in which he resided. And then, the whole question was, whether the school commissioners could take as such? Why not? They were a body of men known to the law; they were, especially, a body of men known to the testator; they were school commissioners for the whole county of Essex, and therefore, for each and 330 every *part of it; for South Farnham as well as the other parts of the county. The testator had a right to give his property to them, if he pleased, and to rely on them to execute the trust he thought proper to repose in them, whether the law charged them officially with the execution of such a trust, or not. The court, if it saw fit, might require security from them for the faithful administration of the fund. Then, as to the objects of the testator's bounty, there would, he said, be little difficulty in saying, that they should be such poor children of South Farnham district, as the school commissioners should select as proper persons to be educated in the primary schools; and the effect would only be, to add one or two to the number of poor children in that district, to receive the advantage of such education.

The Court (dubitante CARR, J.), held that the bequest was void, and therefore reversed the decree, and dismissed the bill.

Rixey v. Bayse.

(Absent TUCKER, P.)

Slander*—Discrediting Witnesses—Evidence of Particular Acts of Hostility—Admissibility.—In trial of action of slander, defendant, to discredit testimony of two witnesses of plaintiff's, offered evidence of particular acts of hostility of those witnesses towards him: HELD, such hostility could only be proved by proving acts of hostility, and therefore the evidence was proper.
Witnesses—Impeachment—Particular Instances of Falsehood—Admissibility.—But when the general reputation of a witness for veracity is in question, the party impeaching his veracity, cannot go into evidence of particular instances of falsehood.

Upon the trial of an action for slander, brought by Bayse against Rixey, in the circuit court of Culpeper, two bills of exceptions were filed by the defendant, to opinions of the court excluding evidence which he wished to adduce.

331 *The first stated, 1. that, the plaintiff having examined two witnesses on his part, named Mershon and Benier, and a witness introduced by the defendant being under examination, his counsel, with a view to shew that the plaintiff's witnesses, Mershon and Benier, entertained ill feelings towards the defendant, asked the defendant's witness, whether Mershon and Benier had not, before this trial, written and circulated papers derogatory of the defendant? The plaintiff's counsel objected to the inquiry, and the court thinking it improper, would not suffer it to be answered. 2. The defendant's counsel (with the same view) asked the witness, whether Mershon and Benier had done any thing evincing ill feelings towards the defendant, and if so, what they had done? The witness having answered the first part of this question in the affirmative, and going on, in answer to the latter, to speak of the papers referred to in the first question above mentioned, the plaintiff's counsel objected to the evidence, and the court stopt the witness, and would not suffer him to speak of those papers. 3. The defendant (still with the same view) asked the witness, whether he had ever heard Mershon and Benier repeat certain words, which they or either of them acknowledged they had written and published concerning the defendant, and which he offered to prove were violently abusive of him? The plaintiff's counsel objected, that the question was improper, and the court sustained the objection. And then, 4. the defendant offered testimony to prove the fact, that Mershon and Benier had written and published papers very derogatory from his character and abusive; but the plaintiff's counsel objected to the evidence, and the court excluded it. To which opinions of the court, the defendant excepted.

The second bill of exceptions stated, that, the defendant intending to impeach the credit of the plaintiff's witness Mershon, on the ground of his hostility towards the defendant, the plaintiff to sustain Mershon's credit, introduced a witness named Tutt, who testified that he was well acquainted with Mershon, that his character for veracity was *fair, and that his testimony in a court of justice was worthy of credit. On cross examination, Tutt said, that having heard, shortly before, that Mershon had been making some statements concerning himself, for which he determined to call him to account upon sight, he had accordingly called upon Mershon, who denied having ever made such statements, with which denial he, Tutt, was satisfied. Whereupon, the defendant's counsel put this question to Tutt — "Did you derive the information of Mershon's having made the statements about you, which he afterwards denied having made, from gentlemen in whose veracity you placed the most implicit confidence?" The plaintiff's counsel objected to the question, and the court sustained the objection; to which the defendant excepted.

Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for 300 dollars; from which Rixey appealed to this court.

Stanard for the appellant.

Briggs for the appellee.

BROOKE, J. The court is of opinion, that the circuit court erred in excluding a portion of the evidence, stated in the first bill of exceptions, the object of which was to prove particular facts, shewing that the witnesses, who had been examined by the plaintiff, had ill feelings towards the appellant. It is true, particular facts are not permitted to be proved, to impeach the credit of a witness when supported by general reputation; but hostility towards one of the parties is not, in its nature, a matter of general reputation; and if proved at all, must be proved by particular facts or circumstances. The objection to the opinion of the circuit court stated in the second bill of exceptions, is not well founded. The court was right in refusing to permit the witness Tutt to answer a question intended to prove a particular fact, in order to discredit a witness, to whose general character for veracity he had before borne testimony. The credit of a witness can be impeached by general evidence *only, and not by evidence as to particular facts. Stark. Law Ev. part 2, § 28, vol. 1, p. 145; 3 Id. part 4, vol. 3, p. 1753.

The judgment is to be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court for a new trial, upon which the appellant is to be permitted to give evidence of particular facts or circumstances, shewing that the plaintiff's witnesses entertained ill feelings towards him.

Elam v. Keen.

March, 1883.

[26 Am. Dec. 322.]

(Absent TUCKER, P.)

Gift of Bond in Suit—Delivery of Attorney's Receipt—Validity.*—The owner of a bond which was in suit, and for which the owner held an attorney's receipt, told the plaintiff that he might have the bond, and delivered him the attorney's receipt for it, instead of delivering the bond itself, which was then filed in the suit in court; no consideration was given by the plaintiff for the bond: HELD, this was a valid gift of the bond to the plaintiff, and he is entitled to recover the money collected upon it.

Assumpsit, by Keen against Elam, in the circuit court of Chesterfield, for money had and received by the defendant to the plaintiff's use. Pleas, non assumpsit, and the statute of limitations. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, for 183 dollars, with interest &c.

At the trial, the plaintiff gave in evidence the last will and testament of Elisha Keen deceased, whereby he devised and bequeathed his whole estate to his mother Elizabeth Keen; who was also his executrix. And then he adduced testimony, proving that Elizabeth Keen, the executrix, being possessed of a bond executed to her testator, which was then in suit, and holding an attorney's receipt for the same, the bond being filed among the papers in the suit, told the plaintiff that he might have the bond, and gave him the 334 *attorney's receipt for it. And then the defendant shewed, that he was the administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Elisha Keen, and the executor of Elizabeth Keen. Whereupon, his counsel moved the court to instruct the jury that the gift made as above mentioned, if without consideration, was void in law, and that the plaintiff was not entitled, in consequence thereof, to recover the proceeds of the bond in this action; but the court refused to give such instruction. The defendant excepted to the opinion; and appealed from the judgment to this court.

Rhodes, for the appellant, argued, that the gift of the bond by Elizabeth Keen to the appellee, under which he claimed, being

*Gifts—Delivery.—In Yancey v. Field, 85 Va. 760, 8 S. E. Rep. 721. It is said, the gift of a bond may be affected not only by a delivery of the bond itself, but by a delivery out of the donor's control of an instrument without which he could not recover the fund from his debtor or agent. This is illustrated by the case of Elam v. Keen, 4 Leigh 333, in which case the donor, holding an attorney's receipt for a bond in suit, which was filed with papers in the court, told the plaintiff he could have it, and delivered to him the receipt, and this was held a sufficient delivery to constitute a valid gift. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Lee v. Boak, 11 Gratt. 187, 188; 1 Va. Law Reg. 874.

In Clarke v. Hageman, 18 W. Va. 728, the principal case is cited to the point that a note or draft may be assigned by the transfer of the attorney's receipt. In Hulings v. Hulings Lumber Co., 38 W. Va. 381, 18 S. E. Rep. 681, the principal case is cited on the question of equitable assignment. The principal case is reported in 26 Am. Dec. 322, with note.

See monographic note on "Gifts" appended to Barker v. Barker, 2 Gratt. 344.

a mere parol gift, without actual delivery to the donee of the thing given, could not pass the title to him; and that the delivery of the attorney's receipt for the bond, was not tantamount to actual delivery of the bond. The possession of the attorney's receipt, did not authorize the appellee to demand of the attorney, either the bond itself, or the proceeds of it, when collected; it was nowise an assignment of the bond. He cited Ewing v. Ewing, 2 Leigh 337; Irons v. Smallpiece, 2 Barn. & Ald. 552; Bunn v. Markham, 7 Taunt. 244, 2 Eng. C. L. R. 81; Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. sr. 431, 442; Duffield v. Elwes, 1 Sims. & Stu. 239.

Taylor, contra, maintained, that the delivery of the attorney's receipt for the bond was equivalent to the delivery of the bond itself; it was a symbolical delivery of it. There can be no doubt it was so intended, since there was no other imaginable purpose for which it could have been delivered. And the bond not being in the actual possession of the donor at the time, but being filed in court, the only mode of delivering it, was by delivering the attorney's receipt for it, to the donee. He cited, and examined, Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473; Jones v. Selby, Prec. in Chan. 300; Drury v. Smith, 1 P. Wms. 404; Snellgrove v. Baily, 3 Atk. 214; Cotteen v. Missing, 1 Madd. Ch. Rep. 176, 183; Noble v. Smith, 2 Johns. Rep. 52, 56; Pierson v. Pierson, 7 Id. 26; Grangiac v. Arden, 10 Id. 293; Cook v. Husted, 12 Id. 188.

CARR, J. That no valid gift of a chattel can be made, without delivery of the thing given, or something equivalent to such delivery, is settled law, as this court decided in Ewing v. Ewing, upon the authority of many cases there cited. The question is, has there been such delivery here? In contracts of sale, a constructive or, symbolical delivery is sufficient to pass the right to the chattel sold, and put it at the risk of the vendee: the cases cited in Pleasants v. Pendleton prove this. But lord Hardwicke, in Ward v. Turner, denies (as a general proposition) that such delivery is sufficient to render a gift valid. There are many things, of which actual, manual tradition cannot be made, either from their nature, or their situation at the time: it is not the intention of the law, to take from the owner the power of giving these: it merely requires that he shall do what, under the circumstances, will in reason, be considered equivalent to an actual delivery. Thus, in Jones v. Selby, A. called up two of his servants, and sent for his relative Mrs. W. who had been his housekeeper many years, and to whom he had by his will given £500. and said, in their presence, "I give to my cousin Mrs. W. this hair trunk, and all that is contained in it;" and he delivered her the key thereof, and bid the servants take notice and remember it &c. Three years after, A. made another will by which he gave Mrs. W. £1000. but took no notice of the gift of the trunk. He died soon afterwards; and four days after, upon opening the trunk in the presence of several persons, there was found in it several rings, pieces of gold, and among other things a tally upon the government for £500. This was considered a sufficient delivery of the tally, though the subsequent will was taken as a satisfaction. Upon this case, lord Hardwicke, in Ward v. Turner, comments thus: "The only case in which such a symbol seems to be held good, is Jones v. Selby, but I am of opinion, that amounted to the *same thing as delivery of possession of the tally, provided it was in the trunk at the time. Therefore, it was rightly compared to the cases upon 21 Jac. 1, Ryal v. Rowles [1 Atk. 165,] and others. It never was imagined on that statute, that the delivery of a mere symbol, in the name of the thing, would be sufficient to take it out of that statute: yet notwithstanding, delivery of the key of bulky goods, where wines &c. are, has been allowed as delivery of the possession, because it is the way of coming at the possession, or to make use of the thing: and therefore, the key is not a symbol, which would not do." In Nobel v. Smith, chief justice Kent says, "The cases in which the delivery of a symbol has been held sufficient to perfect the gift, were those in which it was considered equivalent to actual delivery; as the key of a trunk, of a room, or of a warehouse, which was the true and effectual way of obtaining the use of the subject." Upon these authorities, and the reason of the case, I am of opinion (though certainly not without doubts) that the delivery of the receipt, accompanying the gift of the bond, made it a valid gift. The bond itself could not be delivered: it was in court; in the custody of the law. The receipt was its representative. We must presume it described the bond accurately, and stated that it was received to be put in suit; and that when collected, the attorney would account for it. As in the case of the key, the delivery of this receipt, "was the true and effectual way of obtaining the use of the subject." Speaking from my own experience, I should say an attorney requires no better order for the payment of money he has collected on a bond, than the receipt he has given for the bond: when he takes this in, with a receipt upon it for the money, he feels himself safe. I think, therefore, the circuit court did not err in refusing to give the instruction to the jury asked by the appellant.

CABELL, J., concurred.

337 *BROOKE, J. I think the circuit court was clearly right in refusing to give the instruction to the jury. A parol gift of a personal chattel, is distinguishable from a sale, in this, that until it is perfected by the delivery of the article or of some equivalent for it, the donor may retract the gift. The old common law on this subject, differed much from the rule of the civil law, which seems to have been adopted by the judges in England, from a pretty remote period. In Clayton 135, it was said, that if A. being at York gives a horse to J. S. he may have trespass for the horse: or, as is said 6 Bac. Abr. Trover C. p. 683, if the person, in whom there is a general property in goods which lie at York, give them to J. S. who is in London, and before he obtains possession of them, a stranger converts them, J. S. may have trover for them. But this doctrine has been long since changed, and the rule of the civil law preferred. By the common law, trover will not lie until the property is changed; and the decisions have settled, that a gift without delivery or some equivalent does not change the property. As long as the donor may retract the gift, the donee can have no action concerning it.

The gifts, in the case before us, was proved to have been made by Mrs. Keen to the appellee; and the attorney's receipt for the bond, the subject of the gift, then in suit, was delivered to the donee. This was as effectual as the delivery of the bond itself. The attorney was bound to respect his receipt: he could not have refused to pay the money collected on the bond, or to deliver the bond itself, if demanded, to the donee. In the case of Ward v. Turner, the doctrine is very fully examined by lord Hardwicke. That was the case of a donation causa mortis of receipts for South Sea stock, which was held invalid. His first objection was, that there was but one witness, whereas the civil law, from which the doctrine was taken, required five; but this he did not rely on. In conclusion, he said, that the gift there was merely legatory, and amounted to a nuncupative will, and contrary to the statute of frauds. He 338 seems to admit the authority *of Jones v. Selby, where a tally for £500. was given by the delivery of the key of a trunk, in which it was found; though he intimates, that lord Cowper went, in that case, on the ground of a satisfaction or ademption. This doctrine was examined by this court, in Ewing v. Ewing, where it is said that there is no distinction between gifts causa mortis and gifts inter vivos (like that now before us), except that in the former case, the gift does not take effect until the death of the donor, in the latter, it takes effect immediately.

Fleming's Ex'or v. Dunlop & Buchanan & C.

March, 1833.

(Absent CABELL, J.)

Judgments—Revival—Statute of Limitations.—Judgment recovered by D. P. & Co. against F. in September 1810, and execution sued out in the same month, and another in October 1815, but neither returned; to a scire facias to revive the judgment against F.'s ex'or, sued out in July 1826, defendant pleads in bar, the statute of limitations, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 5.—plaintiffs reply the two executions sued out in September 1810, and October 1815: on demurrer to this replication: HELD, the statute is a bar to the scire facias.

Same—Debt—Statute of Limitations.—But it seems,

Judgments—Revival—Statute of Limitations.—In Hutcheson v. Grubbs, 80 Va. 255. It is said, the time, however, within which executions and writs of scire facias could be issued on judgments was prescribed by statute; and in Fleming v. Dunlop, 4 Leigh 338, it was said by JUDGE CARR, that where no execution issued within the prescribed time the judgment was annihilated. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Ayre v. Burke, 82 Va. 340, 4 S. E. Rep. 618; Dabney v. Shelton, 82 Va. 351, 4 S. E. Rep. 618; White v. Offield, 90 Va. 339, 18 S. E. Rep. 436; Werdenbaugh v. Reid, 20 W. Va. 562.

Same—Action of Debt—Limitation.—But it seems by the opinion of TUCKER, P., in the principal case, that debt would lie on the judgment and the statute would not be a bar to that action. For this proposition, the principal case is cited in Herrington v. Harkins, 1 Rob. 600, 601, and note.

See monographic notes on "Judgments" appended by the opinion of TUCKER, P., that debt would lie on the judgment, and the statute would not be a bar to that action.

Dunlop & Buchanan, surviving partners of Dunlop, Pollock & Co. sued out a scire facias in July 1826, against Moseley the executor of Fleming, to revive a judgment, recovered in September 1810, by Dunlop, Pollock & Co. against Fleming in his lifetime, in the circuit court of Henrico. The defendant pleaded, 1. no such record; and 2. that the judgment in the scire facias mentioned, was recovered in September 1810, and no execution thereon had ever been sued out and returned, and no execution, scire facias or action of debt, had been sued out or brought 339 *within ten years next before the date of this scire facias. The plaintiffs put in the general replication to the first plea; and to the plea of the statute of limitations, they replied, that an execution was sued out on the judgment on the 19th September 1810, returnable the 1st November following, and another execution on the 4th October 1815, returnable the 16th December following. To this replication the defendant demurred generally.

The court having found on inspection that there was such a record, the only question was, upon the demurrer, whether the plea of the statute of limitation was a bar to the scire facias? The circuit court held, that it was not, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendant appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here by Taylor and Johnson for the appellant, and P. N. Nicholas and R. C. Nicholas for the appellees. The question was, whether the 5th section of the statute of limitations, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, p. 489, provides any limitation to a scire facias, or action of debt, upon a judgment on which an execution has been sued out, and no return made thereon?

CARR, J. This question has perplexed me exceedingly; and the opinion which I shall now give, is by no means confidently entertained.

At common law, no scire facias lay in personal actions. Where the plaintiff had suffered the year and day to pass without taking out execution, he was driven 340 to an action of *debt on his judgment. To remedy this inconvenience, was one of the objects of the statute of Westm. 2, ch. 45, which gave the scire facias in personal actions, not as a substitute for the action of debt, but as a cumulative remedy. The statute prescribed no limitation of time, after which the scire facias should be barred: but the courts, to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425, and "Limitation of Actions" appended to Herrington v. Harkins, 1 Rob. 591.

*This section, first enacted in 1792, is in these words: Judgments in any court of record within this commonwealth, where execution hath not issued, may be revived by scire facias or action of debt brought thereon, within ten years next after the date of such judgment, and not after: or where execution hath issued, and no return is made thereon, the party in whose favor the same was issued, shall and may obtain other executions, or move against the sheriff or other officer, or his or their security or securities, for not returning the same, for the term of ten years from the date of such judgment, and not after.—Note in Original Edition.

in regulating the practice, established, that if the judgment were less than seven years old, the plaintiff might sue out a scire facias as matter of course; if more than seven years, but under ten, he could not have the scire facias without a side bar rule; if above ten, and under twenty years old, there must be a motion under counsel's hand, supported by an affidavit that the judgment remained unsatisfied; and if the judgment be more than twenty years standing, there must be a rule to shew cause on a similar affidavit. Hardisty v. Barny, Salk. 598; 2 Wms. Saund. 72, f. Where execution had issued within the year, the plaintiff might sue out other executions, at any time, without a scire facias, provided the first execution had been returned and filed, and continuances entered; but if the first execution had not been returned and filed, though the continuances were entered on the roll, a second execution would be quashed. Thus, in Blazer v. Baldwin, 2 Wils. 82, within a year after the judgment, a feri facias was sued out, and was continued upon the roll, from easter term 1757 to trinity term 1758, and the defendant being this term taken on a ca. sa. issued upon the judgment, it was moved that this is irregular, there neither being any scire facias to revive the judgment, nor any execution returned by the sheriff, to warrant the entry of the continuances on the roll: the court held that the defendant must be discharged out of custody, and the plaintiff must pay the costs of this application, for that it was irregular to continue an execution on the roll which was never returned or filed.

The statute of Westm. 2, in regard to writs of scire facias, was in force with us, I believe, down to the last revival of 1819, subject to such modifications as were 341 introduced *by our statutes from time to time. In the revision of 1792, that which stands now as the 5th section of our statute of limitations, was first enacted; it has ever since continued to be law. It is under the last clause of this section, that the case before us arises. The original judgment was obtained in September 1810, and the scire facias was sued in 1826, sixteen years after the judgment; but an execution was sued out in September 1810, and another in 1815, neither of which has ever been returned. Is the statute a bar to the scire facias? The cause was very well argued; and I was strongly inclined to think with the appellee's counsel, that this scire facias might be maintained, upon the distinction so impressively urged by them, between a judgment on which no execution had issued, and one where execution had been taken out, though it had never been returned. The statute is express, that where no execution has issued, ten years shall bar a scire facias, but it says not a word about a scire facias as applicable to the case where execution has issued, though there has been no return. Further examination, however, has compelled me to change my first impression, and to believe that this scire facias cannot be sustained. The object of the statute seems clearly to have been, to curtail the cases comprehended by each clause of the section, of some privilege; to limit proceedings on them: and the period it fixes in both cases, is ten years. Where no execution has issued, it makes that period annihilate the judgment. In England, we have seen, the issuing an execution makes no difference, unless it be returned and filed; the judgment is still considered, as if no execution had issued. If our legislature had so considered it, it would doubtless have placed the two cases upon the same ground. But, it is clear to me, the legislature believed, that the execution having gone into the officer's hands, the judgment would continue alive, though there should be no return, and therefore could not be in need of a revival by scire facias, and indeed could not be the subject of such revival. The words of the law shew this; for they 342 consider *the party in whose favor the execution issued, as having, though that execution was not returned, the power of obtaining other executions from time to time; and this power he could only have upon the hypothesis, that it was a case neither requiring nor admitting of a scire facias to revive. The law, then, considered the party as in full possession of the right (indefinite as to time) of renewing his executions, and moving against the officer; and these rights (all he possessed over the subject) the statute proceeds to limit to ten years, and to bar after the lapse of ten years from the date of the judgment. From this view of the law, I must conclude that the appellees cannot maintain their scire facias.

BROOKE, J. The question is, whether this case is within the provisions of the 5th section of the statute of limitations? The remedies in the two cases provided for in the section (namely, 1. where no execution has issued and 2. where execution has issued and no return thereon) are as distinctly marked as language could distinguish them. The error in the argument seems to have been in exploring the law as it stood before the statute, instead of attending to its letter and spirit. The 6th section, saving the remedy in cases of disability &c. seems to ascertain and confirm the construction of the 5th section. As the law stood before the statute, a scire facias could not issue after the expiration of seven years, but on a side bar motion, which was ex parte, without notice; and after ten years, without motion in court, on notice; presumption of payment increasing in strength with lapse of time. And, in a case like that before us, the executions, which have been sued out and not returned, would have been considered in the same light as if no execution had issued; Blazer v. Baldwin, 2 Wils. 82. But under our statute, the motions resorted to in the english practice, are dispensed with; and, in the case in which an execution has been sued out and not returned, the liberty to sue out other executions, toties quoties, or to 343 move against the *sheriff, is substituted for the remedy by scire facias, or (it may be) other remedies existing before the statute. This, I think, is the law of this case. But cases may occur, as where execution has issued within the ten years, but not returnable till after, and then not returned by the sheriff, or where the party may die under execution after the expiration of the ten years; and, in such cases, the 5th and 6th sections may probably receive a more liberal construction, and other executions may be allowed. The judgment should be reversed.

TUCKER, P. The question must, I think, be determined in favor of the appellant.

The proceedings after judgment may be in three states: 1. There may have been no execution issued whatever, within the year; 2. an execution may have been issued, but not returned; and 3. execution may have been issued, and returned. In the first of these cases, the common law presumed the debt to have been paid or released; and would not therefore permit the party after the expiration of the year to sue out execution. He was driven to his action of debt. In the second also, the result would seem to have been the same at the common law; for after the scire facias was given, it was determined, that where no execution was returned and filed, no execution could regularly issue without a scire facias, because the execution could not in such case be regularly kept alive by continuances. In the third case, as from the return it must appear whether the debt had or had not been paid, there was no room for presumption, and therefore the execution might be continued down by continuances entered upon the roll for any indefinite time. The form of the entry in these continuances may be seen in Tidd's Practical Forms, p. 361, and in Lilly's Entries 500. And these continuances were held necessary, and for want of them a scire facias became essential. 11 Vin. Abr. Execution, O. a. pl. 9, p. 8; 6 Bac. Abr. Scire Facias, C. p. 107; Blazer v. Baldwin, 2 Wils. 82; Barnes's 344 *Notes 213. Yet, as the entry of these continuances was a mere matter of form, and the mere act of the party and the clerk, without the renewed executions ever coming to the hands of the sheriff, it was at length decided, that if a good foundation was laid for them, that is, if there had been within the year an execution actually issued and returned no goods or non est inventus, and filed by the sheriff, the plaintiff might enter the continuances on the roll, even after notice given of a motion to quash the execution on the ground that it was out of date. 2 Barnes's Notes 172.

The common law having, after the expiration of the year, driven the plaintiff to his action of debt on his judgment, where execution had not issued, or if issued had never been returned, the statute of Westm. 2, ch. 45, was made to facilitate his remedy by giving him the scire facias. Its language was very general; and the proceeding by scire facias was adopted by the judges to carry its provisions into execution. It contained no limitation whatever; so that, at any time, however remote, the defendant might have been vexed by a scire facias, but for the regulations adopted by the courts, and detailed by judge Carr in the opinion just delivered. Our legislature was not content with leaving this matter to the courts. It has provided the absolute bar of a statutory limitation. It has declared, that where no execution hath issued, the plaintiff shall not even have his action of debt or scire facias after ten years. Where execution hath issued, and not been returned, the phraseology of the statute is different; and the gist of the question here, is, what is the true interpretation of this clause?

By the common law, in this case as well as in the former, we have seen, that the party could only have proceeded, after the year, by action of debt. For he could not enter the continuances on the roll for want of a return, 2 Wils. 82, and the execution ran out of date for want of the continuances. His only remedy, therefore, was a new original (or an action of debt on the judgment) to which after the statute of Westm. 2, was added the scire facias, 345 and to these there was no limitation.

For this case also our statute provided a statutory limitation in lieu of the rules of practice adopted by the courts of Westminster. It declares that where execution hath issued and no return is made thereon, the party in whose favor the same was issued, shall and may obtain other executions, for the term of ten years from the date of the judgment, and not after. Now, I understand this clause of the act as an absolute bar to the parties obtaining execution upon the subsisting judgment, in any mode whatever. It may not have taken away the remedy by action of debt, for that did not give the party a new execution upon the old judgment, but it gave him a new judgment. Accordingly it has been held, not to be barred; Randolph v. Randolph, 3 Rand. 490. But it did bar the obtaining any execution on the old judgment after ten years. Now executions on judgments are obtained in two ways, either by the mere direction of the party, or by the award of the court upon a scire facias; and the law declares, in general terms, they shall not be obtained after ten years. It, therefore, prohibits their being obtained in any way, either at the will of the party or by the award of the court on a scire facias. This conclusion is rendered inevitable when we consider, that where execution has issued, but has not been returned, the party could not issue another after the year; he was driven to his scire facias; 2 Wils. 82. The statute, therefore, was not necessary to prevent his obtaining execution, at his own pleasure, from the clerk: that he was already prevented from doing, by the judgment having been suffered to go out of date for want of an execution duly returned and filed, and which could be regularly continued down. But it was necessary to prevent his obtaining execution by scire facias; and this was its effect. If the provision had not this effect, it had no effect; there was no other case for it to operate upon.

It is not easy to perceive why the peculiar phraseology of this clause was adopted, unless we suppose, that there was possibly a doubt in the minds of the committee of revision *of 1792, whether the plaintiff might not have a right to sue out execution at pleasure, where execution had issued though not returned. If so, it is natural they should have used the broad expressions of this clause, as the more narrow language of the first would not have reached the case.

In Randolph v. Randolph, it is said to have been admitted, that a scire facias would lie after ten years, where execution had not been returned, and that the statute in such case is no bar. But this point is taken as a concession of the bar, and does not seem to have been critically examined by the bench. I do not, therefore, feel myself bound by it, as it was unnecessary that it should have been decided; for as the action of debt would have been sustainable upon the judgment in that case, the party was entitled to recover whether the scire facias was barred or not.

Judgment reversed, and judgment entered for the appellant.

Sims v. Harrison and Another.

March, 1833.

(Absent TUCKER, P.)

Slaves—Wrongfully Taken in Execution—Right of Owner to Injunction.*—In every case, in which the owner of slaves wrongfully taken in execution for the debt of another, applies to a court of equity to inhibit the sale of them, the court ought to award an injunction, and if the case be made out, to give relief, though it be neither alleged in the bill, nor proved, that the slaves have any peculiar value.

Randolph Harrison and Samuel Jones exhibited a bill against Edward Sims and the sheriff of Buckingham, in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond,—setting forth, that sundry executions having been sued out on judgments against Charles Irving, and levied by the sheriff of 347 Buckingham, *on three negro girls the slaves of Irving, the plaintiffs purchased these slaves at their full value at the sheriff's sale, and paid the money for them, and then left them on Irving's plantation, for the convenience of his family (the slaves being favorite house servants) but they were at all times completely under the plaintiffs' control. And that, afterwards, Sims, having sued out a fieri facias on a judgment against Irving, and delivered it to the sheriff, caused it to be levied on the same three slaves; and the sheriff had advertised them for sale to satisfy this execution. Therefore, the bill prayed an injunction to inhibit the sheriff from making such sale.

The chancellor thinking that the plaintiffs' proper remedy was an action at law, denied the injunction; but it was awarded by this court.

Sims then put in his answer, objecting to the jurisdiction of the court of chancery to give relief in such a case; and alleging, that the purchase of the slaves by the plaintiffs, was not made bona fide with their own money, but with money furnished by others for Irving's benefit, and was a mere contrivance to protect Irving's property from his creditors.

The chancellor, still adhering to his first opinion, that the case stated in the bill was not proper for relief in equity; and, suggesting that the cases decided by the court of appeals, on like questions of jurisdiction, reported in 3 Randolph (alluding to the cases of Bowyer v. Creigh, 3 Rand. 25, and Allen v. Freeland, Id. 170,) had perhaps escaped the notice of the judges of the court of appeals, when the injunction in this case was awarded,—therefore, discharged the injunction, as having been impropvidently awarded. From this order the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

Upon the hearing of the appeal, this court said, that the chancellor was mistaken in supposing that the cases in 3rd Randolph on like questions, had escaped its attention; that though there had been some diversity of opinion, whether peculiar value of slave property ought not to be alleged in a bill praying relief in such cases, yet when 348 that matter was *alleged (as it was in this bill) an injunction to inhibit the sale of slaves unjustly taken in execution, ought to be awarded by a court of chancery, notwithstanding that the plaintiff might recover damages at law for the wrongful seizure of his property, or the property itself in an action of detinue; and that, on a review of all the cases on the point, it had been determined by a full court, in Randolph v. Randolph, 6 Rand. 194, that, in every case in which the owner of slaves wrongfully taken under execution, applies to a court of equity to inhibit the sale of them, the court ought to award an injunction, and, if the case be made out, to give relief, though it be neither alleged in the bill, nor proved, that the slaves have any peculiar value. Therefore, the court sustaining the jurisdiction of the court of chancery in the present case, reversed the order dissolving the injunction, ordered the injunction to be reinstated, and to stand till the hearing, and remanded the cause.

In the sequel of the proceedings in the court of chancery, the allegations of the bill and the perfect fairness of the plaintiffs' purchase, were clearly proved; and

Chancery Practice—Sale of Property under Execution—Injunction.—In Baker v. Rinehard, 11 W. Va. 241. It is said: "In Virginia the decisions seem to establish the principle: 'That a court of equity should not interfere, to prevent a creditor from seizing and selling under his execution any property, which he may think liable to it; unless the property be of such a character that the owner cannot be fully compensated by the verdict of a jury giving him its fair market value; and that this can only be, where the property is of such a nature that it may fairly be supposed to have a peculiar and additional value in the estimation of the owner, the pretium affectionis.' 2 Rob. Pr. (old) 225. See Randolph v. Randolph, etc., 3 Munf. 99; Wilson and Trent v. Butler, etc., 3 Munf. 559; Scott et al. v. Halliday, 5 Munf. 103; Sampson v. Bryce, 5 Munf. 175; Bowyer, etc., v. Creigh, 3 Rand. 25; Allen v. Freeland, 3 Rand. 175; Randolph v. Randolph, 6 Rand. 198; Sims v. Harrison, 4 Leigh 346; Kelly v. Scott, 5 Gratt. 479; Summers, etc., v. Bean, 13 Gratt. 417. In some of these cases the court rendered no opinion; in others the language used was loose or more general, from which, if the case, in which the language is used, is not particularly examined, it might be inferred, that a court of equity in such cases would interpose when, from the nature of the case, the remedy at law was incomplete, without reference to the peculiar nature of the property. But if the cases themselves are examined, it will appear that the law as laid down by Robinson in his Practice, as quoted above, is fairly inferrible from all the Virginia decisions, and is clearly expressed and laid down in some of them."

the chancellor, upon the hearing of the cause, perpetuated the injunction. And then Sims appealed to this court—

349 *Beck's Adm'x v. De Baptists and Others.

Deeds of Trust—Recordation—Bona Fide Purchaser*—

Case at Bar.—By written articles, Head contracts to sell to Benj. De Baptist, a lot of land, for bricks to be furnished and laid by vendee in walls of a house to be built for vendor; vendee, unable to perform the contract, transfers it, before work begun, to John and William De Baptist, with Head's consent; John and William borrow $500 of Beck, and give him a deed of trust of the lot to secure the payment; then, John and William furnish the bricks and do the work for Head, according to the contract; but, afterwards, Benjamin sells the same lot to Edward De Baptist, and he sells it to Long, and Benjamin, Edward, John and William all join in conveyance to Long, all the parties having actual notice of Beck's deed of trust; and then Long sells it to Adams, who has no notice of the deed of trust;—the legal title having been retained by Head, as security for performance of the contract on part of vendee, and still remaining in him: HELD, that Beck has the best right to call for the legal title, and to subject the property to the payment of the $500 secured to him by the deed of trust, if that deed was duly recorded before Adams's purchase, otherwise not.

Upon a bill in the superiour court of chancery of Fredericksburg, exhibited by James Beck in his lifetime, and upon his death pending the suit revived by his administratrix, against Benjamin, John, William and Edward De Baptist, Joshua Long, Thomas Adams and Emanuel Head, the case appearing by the pleadings and proofs, was thus:

By articles of agreement between Emanuel Head and Benjamin De Baptist dated the 19th August 1818, Head contracted to sell and convey part of a lot in the town of Fredericksburg to Benjamin De Baptist, for 100,000 good and merchantable bricks to be furnished and laid by him, in a workmanlike manner, in the walls of a house which Head was then about to build, and 100 dollars in money or groceries, to be paid or delivered by the vendee. Head retained the legal title as a security for the performance of the contract on the part of the vendee.

Benjamin De Baptist, finding himself unable to fulfil the contract on his part, by parol agreement, on the 23rd November 1818, transferred the contract to his brothers

John and William De Baptist, who

350 were to fulfil his agreement *with Head, and thereupon to receive the conveyance of the title from him. To this transfer of the contract, Head was privy and assenting, and wrote an agreement on the articles, stating the transfer and the terms of it, to be signed by all the parties, but it was never in fact signed by any of them. The legal title remaining in Head, it was alleged in the bill, that Benjamin De Baptist executed a deed conveying his equitable interest to John and William, which deed was afterwards fraudulently suppressed; and there was some, though not conclusive, proof, to shew that such a deed had been executed.

On the 3rd April 1819, John and William De Baptist borrowed 500 dollars of the plaintiff Beck, for the purpose, it seemed, of enabling them to comply with the contract with Head; and conveyed the lot purchased of Head, or rather, in effect, their equitable interest therein, to a trustee, in trust to secure the payment of the 500 dollars to Beck. It was alleged in the bill, and not denied in the answers, and there was moreover strong proof to shew, that this deed of trust from John and William De Baptist was duly recorded in the hustings court of Fredericksburg; but no certificate of the registry of the deed appeared in the record of this suit.

Notwithstanding the transfer of the contract to John and William, Benjamin De Baptist executed a deed conveying the lot (that is all his equitable interest in it) to his brother Edward. This deed bore date the 5th May 1819, and was recorded on the 5th November in that year. It was alleged in the bill, that the deed was antedated, and that it was in fact executed on the day it was recorded; but of this there was no proof.

Meantime, in the course of the year 1819, John and William De Baptist commenced the building of the house for Head, furnishing and laying the bricks in the walls, according to the original contract; but they did not intirely complete the contract on their part; and then, Edward De Baptist undertook and finished the walls.

351 *Whereupon, Head prepared a deed of conveyance of the lot he had sold, to Benjamin De Baptist; which deed was not delivered, because a part of the purchase money was yet to be paid; and afterwards, he was requested by Benjamin, to execute the deed to Edward De Baptist, and by Edward to execute it to Joshua Long. But the balance of the purchase money remaining still unpaid, Head withheld the conveyance, retaining the legal title as security for the debt.

But on the 9th December 1819, a deed of conveyance of the lot was executed to Long, by Benjamin De Baptist, the original vendee, John and William De Baptist, who were first substituted for him, and Edward De Baptist, all joining in the conveyance; thus shewing the knowledge of all parties to the deed, of the intermediate rights of John and William; and there was clear proof, that, at the time this deed was made to Long, Benjamin and Edward De Baptist and Long, all three, had actual and full notice of the deed of trust of the 3rd April 1819, which had been executed by John and William De Baptist to secure the debt of 500 dollars to Beck; and indeed, that it was a main purpose of the transaction, and a purpose in which Long co-operated, to defeat Beck's security.

On the 31st December 1819, Long sold and conveyed the lot to Thomas Adams. The bill charged, that Adams had actual notice of Beck's rights under John and William De Baptist's deed of trust of the 3rd April 1819, and that Beck had given him such notice, before he paid the purchase money to Long. But Adams in his answer denied that he had such notice, and there was no proof that he had.

The legal title remaining still in Head, the bill claimed that Beck had the preferable right to call for it; and prayed, that the lot should be subjected to the payment, first, of any balance of the original purchase money that might yet remain due to Head, and then to the payment of the 500 dollars and interest for which it was mortgaged by John and William De Baptist to Beck, by their deed of the 3rd April 1819.

352 *None of the defendants in their answers, pleaded or in any way relief on, the statute of frauds, as affecting the validity of the transfer of the contract or purchase by Benjamin to John and William De Baptist.

It seemed, that Head received full satisfaction of the balance due him during the pendency of the suit in the court of chancery; for he expressly waived an account which had been ordered to ascertain the balance; so that the controversy which remained to be decided, was that between Beck and the other defendants.

The chancellor, on the hearing, dismissed the bill: from which decree, Beck by petition to this court, prayed an appeal; which was allowed.

The cause was argued by Harrison and Stanard for the appellant, and by Johnson for the appellee.

I. The first question was a question of fact; namely, whether, after the parol agreement between Benjamin De Baptist and his brothers, John and William, whereby he transferred to them the benefit of his purchase of the lot from Head, and they undertook to perform the contract on the part of the purchaser, Benjamin made a deed to John and William conveying to them his equitable interest in the subject? The proofs furnished reason to justify an inference, that there was such a deed executed; but the evidence on the point, was certainly not decisive.

II. Supposing no such deed from Benjamin to John and William was executed, and that the transfer of the contract of purchase by him to them, was by parol agreement, the question arose, whether the statute of frauds affected the validity of the parol contract of transfer by Benjamin to John and William, of his equitable interest in the subject under the articles of agreement with Head?

The counsel for the appellant maintained, 1. that the statute of frauds had no manner of application to the case; that the only rights Benjamin had, were those he held under his executory contract with Head, 353 which was in writing, as *the statute required; that the statute applied to the sale of legal titles, or at most equitable titles perfected, not to the transfer of executory rights under executory contracts for the sale and purchase of land; that as the executory contract might have been rescinded or abandoned by parol, so it might be transferred from the purchaser to another by parol. But 2. if the statute of frauds applied to the case, it had not been pleaded, or in any manner relied on. And 3. if the statute applied, and had been formally pleaded, there was such a part performance by John and William, of the contract with Benjamin, whereby his contract with Head was transferred to them, and they substituted as purchasers of the lot in his place, as would suffice to take the case out of the statute.

The counsel for the appellees, argued, 1. that the statute of frauds invalidated the parol agreement between Benjamin and his brothers, John and William. For on Benjamin's part, it was a sale, and on theirs a purchase, of the equitable right to the lot which he had acquired under his contract with Head. If he had performed the contract on his part, and thus acquired a perfect equity in the subject, he would certainly not have been bound by a parol agreement to sell or transfer such an equity in land, upon the same principle that a mortgagor was not bound by a parol agreement for the sale of the equity of redemption. The distinction between the sale of an equitable right in lands under a contract of sale consummated by performance on both parts, and an equitable right depending on an executory contract of sale not yet completed by performance, was, he thought, quite too nice. 2. It was no objection to the defence founded on the statute, that it was not pleaded or relied on in the answers. It could not have been pleaded. The plaintiff did not allege in his bill, that there was a parol agreement between Benjamin and John and William, for the transfer of his rights to them: he alleged a written contract, and that fully executed; namely, a deed from Benjamin to John and William, conveying his equitable right 354 *to them, and the suppression of that deed. He had made out a case in proof, different from that alleged in his bill; and if the statute of frauds applied to the actual case, he could not object that it was not pleaded in defence against the unfounded pretensions of his bill. 3. As to part performance, he said, what had been done by John and William amounted, in effect, to no more than paying the purchase money; and it was well settled, that payment of the purchase money was not such a part performance of a contract for the sale and purchase of lands, as would take the case out of the statute of frauds.

Stanard, in reply, said that the reason why payment of the purchase money was not sufficient part performance to take such a case out of the statute, was, that if nothing more was done, the purchase money afforded an exact measure of retribution, and complete compensation might be given to the purchaser by refunding the money. But here, specific articles of no determinate value, bricks, were to be furnished, and worked up in the walls of a house; there was no certain measure of compensation, and justice could only be done by a specific execution of the contract.

III. There was no doubt, that all the defendants, except Adams, had actual notice of Beck's rights under the deed of trust of the 3rd April 1819; and it was contended on the one side, and denied on the other, that Adams also had actual notice. In truth, there were circumstances which raised a suspicion that he had; but there was no sufficient proof of the fact. But

IV. The counsel for the appellant insisted, that it was immaterial, whether Adams had actual notice or not; for he, as well as Beck, claimed only an equity, and Beck's was the elder equity. The maxim, they said, was strictly applicable, Qui prior est in tempore, potior est in jure.

The counsel for the appellee said, that rule was not applicable in Virginia, to a case like the present, where a mortgagee was asserting his rights under the mortgage, against a subsequent fair purchaser, unless it appeared that the mortgage was duly recorded; for the statute was express, that all mortgages and deeds of trust, to be effectual as against such purchasers, must be recorded. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 4, p. 362. And there was no certificate exhibited in the court of chancery, of the registry of the deed of trust under which Beck claimed.

Stanard replied, that it was alleged in the bill, and not denied in the answers, and admitted on all hands, in the sequel of the proceedings, that the deed of trust had been duly recorded; but if it was not, that the mortgages or deeds of trust required by the statute to be recorded, were only such as passed the title in the subject.

CARR, J. There is pretty strong evidence, that before the execution of the deed of trust by John and William De Baptist of the 3rd April 1819, under which Beck claims, they had received from Benjamin, a conveyance of his equity under his contract with Head, and that this was shewn to Beck to induce him to make the loan. But I do not consider this point as material. It would only be proof that Benjamin had abandoned his interest in the contract to them; and that is otherwise clearly established.

Subsequent to the execution of the deed of trust to Beck, and with notice of it, Edward De Baptist, another brother, received from Benjamin a deed for this same equity; and all the De Baptists joined in conveying the same to Long, who also had notice of Beck's lien. Long sold to Adams. The legal title being still in Head, Beck filed this bill calling for it, making the De Baptists, Long and Adams parties, and praying to subject the lot to sale in satisfaction of his debt. Head answers admitting the contract, the transfer of it by Benjamin to John and William, and the performance on their part; (he does not in his answer, indeed, admit full payment, but it was afterwards admitted by his counsel.) In this state of the case, there seems to me nothing for the statute of frauds to operate upon. It was not pleaded; but it was urged, in the argument, as bearing upon the transfer of the contract from Benjamin to his brothers John and William. But I cannot think that this is either within the words or the mischief of the statute. The contract for the sale of lands, which the statute requires to be in writing, is here, the contract between Benjamin and Head; which was reduced to writing. By furnishing the bricks, building the house, and paying the 100 dollars, Benjamin would have acquired a right to call on Head for the legal title. He transferred to his brothers, the right to stand in his shoes; that is, to do the work, and pay the money: Head accepted them: but this gave them nothing but the privilege of performing the conditions of the written contract; and upon such performance, an equity to call upon Head for the legal title to the lot; a matter (as it seems to me) wholly beside the statute.

The only question, then, is, who has the best right to call for the legal title, which Head is willing to make? Adams relies a good deal, in his answer, on his being a purchaser without notice: but of what is he a purchaser? Not of the legal title, but at most of an equity; which equity, if Beck had acquired before him he must prevail; the rule in such cases being prior in tempore, potior in jure. That Beck was first in time is admitted; but it was objected in the argument, that it no where appears, that his deed was recorded; and that being a deed of trust, it cannot take effect, as to a subsequent purchaser without notice, except from the time of such recording. But I think that upon this record we are bound to take this as a recorded deed. The parties on both sides have so treated it; and the fact is in no shape put in issue. There is evidence also, that it was recorded; and that all parties knew, and never meant to question, the fact that it was recorded. Nor was there any defence for Adams, so natural or ready as to have stated in his answer, that the deed had never been recorded, if the fact had been so; but no such thing is done. Under these circumstances, I feel no doubt, that we must take this as a recorded deed; and that the plaintiff has the best right to call for the legal title, so far as is necessary to the satisfaction of his claim.

357 *TUCKER, P. The legal title to the land conveyed by the deed of trust, in this case, is in Head. There are two antagonizing claimants, each insisting on his preferable right to call for the legal title. The first is Beck, who claims by deed of trust under John and William De Baptist: the other is Adams, who claims also under John and William De Baptist, but likewise sustains his right by claiming under Benjamin. Let us then contrast his rights with those of Beck, under both aspects of his title.

1. Supposing Adams to derive his right from John and William: in this aspect, he has but an equity posterior to that of Beck, to which it must yield, unless he can shew himself a purchaser without notice. This he cannot do, if the deed of trust under which Beck claims, was duly recorded. Whether it was or not, has not been put in issue; and, perhaps, we ought to take for granted, that there was no just objection to it on that score; but it will be safest, in sending the cause back, to leave that matter open to inquiry. If the deed was duly recorded before Adams's purchase, I am clearly of opinion, that it takes precedence of Adams's title, so far as that title is claimed under John and William De Baptist.

2. Supposing Adams to derive his title from Benjamin De Baptist, let us compare the conflicting rights of himself and Beck to call for the legal title. Has Benjamin De Baptist, or Adams as claiming under him, any right whatsoever to call for the title from Head, even if Beck's claim were out of the case? I think not. For, 1. there is now no contract between Benjamin and Head. There was a contract at first, and a contract by which Head agreed to convey him the lot in question. But the parties had a right to abandon, waive or rescind that contract; and that abandonment, waiver or rescission, might be such as to absolve the vendor from it, and to exclude the vendee from a right to a specific performance. Has the vendee Benjamin De Baptist, by his acts in this case, so absolved the vendor? Can 358 he under the circumstances, demand a specific execution by *a conveyance to himself or to those claiming under him? He cannot; for it is proved, that in the fall after the contract, Benjamin called on him to transfer the contract to John and William, and it was agreed that they should have the contract, and build the house, which he had engaged to build. An indorsement was accordingly made on the contract, with the assent of Benjamin, though he did not sign it, and it was afterwards read to John and William, who assented to it, though they did not sign it. Yet they went on to do the work; they went on to borrow money to complete the building; they went on to fulfil the contract. On what ground, then, can Benjamin expect the specific performance of the contract, expressly waived and rescinded by himself, and entered into with his consent by Head with his two brothers. Has he paid any purchase money? Has he given any consideration to entitle him to a conveyance? Has he fulfilled the contract on his part, so as to entitle him to demand performance from Head? By no means. He has never paid one cent; he has never given any consideration; he has never moved one step towards performance.

But suppose a specific performance decreed in his favor or in favor of his vendee: how will the matter stand with Head and John and William De Baptist? As the lot will not go to pay John and William for their work, they must either go unpaid, or they must look to Head, and Head must pay them. But as they entered upon the work, upon the faith of the arrangement made with Head with Benjamin's assent and concurrence, they must not go unpaid, while Benjamin gets the lot for nothing. If Head cannot convey them the lot, he must pay them their money. Then, how will he stand? He will have conveyed away his lot to Benjamin for nothing, and paid the full value of his building to John and William, who really erected it. Can this be tolerated? Shall Benjamin be permitted to waive the contract in behalf of his brothers,—to draw Head thereby into an engagement with them, and then to recant, reassert his right, get the property for nothing, and force Head to pay them 359 for their labour? *It is impossible. Benjamin, therefore, could have no title to specific performance; and Adams stands but in his shoes.

On the other hand, Benjamin having assented to turn the contract over to his brothers, and Head and the brothers assenting thereto, they became entitled to a conveyance from Head upon fulfilling the contract on their part. This equitable right they conveyed to a trustee to secure to Beck the 500 dollars borrowed of him, it seems, to enable them to comply with their bargain. This sum they must repay to Beck, and the lot is liable for that repayment.

I am, therefore, of opinion to reverse the decree and send the cause back for further proceedings, with instructions that Beck's deed of trust shall have preference over Adams, unless it should appear that the deed of trust was not duly recorded.

CABELL and BROOKE, J., concurred in the opinion of the president, and a decree was entered accordingly.

Hare v. Niblo.

March, 1883.

Capias ad Respondendum—Returnable to Term Generally—Effect.—A capias ad respondendum is made returnable to the next term generally. Instead of the first day of the term as the statute requires: the writ is executed before the term and returned to the first day: an office judgment is entered at rules: at the ensuing term, defendant moves to quash the writ and all the proceedings on it at rules, on the ground that the writ being returnable to term generally, was naught: and the court overrules the motion: Held, the motion was rightly overruled.

Debt, in the circuit court of Petersburg, by Niblo against Hare. The writ was made returnable to the next term after its date, generally, instead of the first day of the next term, as it ought regularly to have been. But it was executed before the commencement of the term. After the term,

360 Niblo filed his declaration at the rules; whereupon a conditional judgment by default for want of appearance, was entered against Hare by the clerk, which was confirmed at the succeeding rules; so that the case stood among the office judgments at the then next term. But owing to a vacancy in the office of judge of the court, that term was lost, and all the pending causes stood over till the succeeding term; when Hare's counsel moved the court to quash the writ and all the proceedings had thereon in the office, on the ground that the writ had been made returnable not to the first day of a term of the court, but to the term, generally, and so was irregular. The court overruled the motion. Hare, thereupon, pleaded to the action; and there was a trial, verdict and

Capias ad Respondendum—Returnable to Term Generally—Effect.—In Gas Company v. Wheeling, 7 W. Va. 29, it is said: "The Revised Code of Virginia of 1819 required that a writ of capias ad respondendum should be returnable either to the first day of the next succeeding term, or in the clerk's office to some previous rule day. 1 R. C. ch. 128, § 70. Under this provision it was held by the court of appeals that a writ returnable generally to the 'next term' of a circuit court after its date, not to the first day of the next term, was good. Hare v. Niblo, 4 Leigh 359. We submit to the authority of this case, and recognize its application to the case in hand."

For this proposition, the principal case is cited in White v. Sydenstricker, 6 W. Va. 49.

judgment for Niblo. And then Hare applied to a judge of this court for a superseas; which was allowed.

Allison, for the plaintiff in error. Formerly, writs in actions in the circuit court, were required to be made returnable to the next court, generally; Rev. Code of 1792, ch. 66, § 21, Pleasants's ed. p. 77, and the process might be served at any time during the term to which it was returnable; Dunbar v. Long's adm'r, 4 Hen. & Munf. 212. In that case, Roane, J., dissented; and the inconvenience of having no particular return day, for such process, was clearly pointed out in his opinion. To remedy this inconvenience, the legislature provided, that every writ of capias ad respondendum shall be returnable, at the option of the plaintiff, either to the first day of the next succeeding term, or in the clerk's office to some previous rule day; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 70, p. 507. The writ in this case, therefore, was clearly naught, and furnished no foundation for any proceedings at rules upon it. The court ought to have quashed the writ and the proceedings upon it in the office; for the statute provides, that the court, in term, shall have control over all proceedings in the office during the preceding vacation, and may correct any mistakes or errors, and for good cause set aside the rules and proceedings, and make such order concerning them as may be just and right; Id. § 77, p. 508. *And if the court shall not be held at the stated term, all pending matters and causes stand over in the same plight to the next term. Id. ch. 69, § 8, p. 230.

Wyndham Robertson, for the defendant in error. The provision of the statute of 1819, requiring that writs shall be made returnable to the first day of the succeeding term, might defeat a writ made returnable to the term generally, in case the writ were executed during the term but after the first day (which as the law formerly stood, was perhaps permissible, according to the judgment in Dunbar v. Long's adm'r); but this new provision does not require the abatement of a writ, which, though made returnable to the term generally, has been in fact executed before the term, and returned to the first day of it, as was the case here. The statute does not require, that the writ shall, on its face, be made returnable, but only that it shall be returnable, to the first day of the term; and if it is in fact executed, and returned the first day, it is enough. Even under the former law, judge Roane thought, that a writ returnable to the term generally, should be intended to be returnable to the first day of the term. But, in truth, this motion to quash the writ for irregularity, was in substance and effect, a plea in abatement of the writ; and, as such a plea could not have been received after office judgment; so neither ought this motion to quash the writ, to have been entertained.

Allison, in reply. If the writ was irregular, all the proceedings on it in the office were also irregular, for they had no foundation but the writ. To say that the motion to quash, is equivalent to a plea in abatement, and therefore cannot be heard after office judgment, were, in effect, to deny the control of the court over proceedings in the office, in every case in which there has been an office judgment. This would render the provision, which gives the court such control over the proceedings in the office, almost intirely nugatory.

PER CURIAM. The judgment is to be affirmed.

*May v. Yancey.

March, 1833.

Arbitrators*—Misconduct—Case at Bar.—Award of arbitrators sought to be set aside, on the ground that the conduct of the arbitrators had the effect of a surprize on one of the parties, and so was misconduct, though no partiality or corruption was imputed to them; and HELD, upon all the circumstances of the case, that there was nothing in the proceedings of the arbitrators to invalidate the award.

In two actions, one of debt and the other of assumpsit, brought by Yancey against May, in the hustings court of Richmond, the parties (after a very long and tedious litigation) agreed to refer the controversy to arbitrators; and rules were entered by consent in both suits, at November term 1829, submitting the matters in difference between them in the two cases, to the final determination of Samuel Dunn and Preston Smith, whose award (or the award of their umpire in case of disagreement) thereupon, should be made the judgment of the court; the arbitrators to proceed on the saturday following, at the city hall, with power to adjourn &c. till the award should be completed, without further notice to either party.

On the 16th January 1830, the arbitrators made an award, stating that they had proceeded, according to the order, after giving due notice to the parties, to receive the testimony offered by them, both being present; and "after receiving from each party a full statement and hearing thereupon," they awarded to the plaintiff Yancey, in the action of debt, 245 dollars, with interest &c. and the costs of the suit, and in the action of assumpsit 227 dollars (without interest) and the costs.

This award having been returned to court, a motion was made by the defendant May to set it aside, on the ground of misbehaviour of the arbitrators; and the evidence he offered to sustain this motion, was the testimony of the two arbitrators themselves.

1. Dunn stated, that the arbitrators met at the time and place appointed in the order of submission: that both parties were before them, and exhibited certain papers and *made explanations concerning the cases: that the arbitrators thought they had all the evidence before them, and that the parties were ready for their decision: that after a consultation between the arbitrators on the subject, May, who lived in a distant county, said to them, that if they should not make up their award whilst he was in Richmond, he wished them not to come to any conclusion until he could appear before them again, for the purpose (as Dunn thought at the time, and yet thought) of making further statements and explanations: that the arbitrators did not inform May, that a further day for him to appear before them would not be allowed, nor was any period designated at which the parties should appear before them again: that the award was not made up during May's continuance at Richmond: that probably, it would not have been made up before the quarterly term of the court in February 1830, but that they were pressed by Yancey to proceed; and they concluded the business without having the parties again before them: that in the latter part of January Dunn received a letter from May, dated Staunton, 25th January 1830, in which May said—

"As to the reference in the cases of Yancey against me, I must request, that you take the papers from Mr. Smith, as you are so much engaged in the day, and after you are quite satisfied, return them to him, if you and he think he had best keep them; then I must request, that you and Mr. Smith will not have a final meeting until I come down, as I am satisfied that I had better see that a full and fair explanation is given, and you know that as Yancey did not attend at the Washington tavern, I would not stay in the room with you and Mr. Smith. I do expect Mr. Smith has looked over the papers, and heard all Yancey had to say; and from what you know of the matter, you will think I ought to be heard by myself or counsel; and you know I could not get any meeting for that purpose, except at the Washington, when I would not attend, after Yancey's writing that he would not attend there; and so I

364 expectation *that you would not make up an award until February court, or near that, when I intend to come down, and will be willing to have an end of the matter, as soon as I can be heard before the arbitrators, either by myself with Yancey, or both have counsel—I don't care which. Should he be desirous of having the matter done with sooner, I have no objection, after your taking all the papers to yourself until your are satisfied, and then have a day fixed when you would meet and determine, when our counsel are to attend with you, though I expect you will not take it up until I come down. If you do, I must get the favor of you to tell Mr. Daniel, that I request him to attend for me. As to what Mr. Anderson says, you recollect he was not positive, whether I said that I would not charge any rent until he got possession, or something about the title. You can see, that in January Yancey wrote to me, that Binford said he should not get possession of the Goochland land; he then went up, and got it, and rented it out. After that, in April, he came down, and gave me the obligation for rent, commencing the 1st January 1819; and I went on to pay him off all that I ought. You see, when the conversation passed, he did not expect to get the possession of the Goochland land, and I must have had to look to some one for it. I went up to see Mr. Binford as soon as I received Yancey's note, and told him what I had understood from Yancey, and that I did not care which way, as he Binford was good to me for the rent; when he said he never said any such thing, nor made no such pretensions. I wish before you act to get Mr. Binford's testimony about that, and about the insurance &c. &c. Please let me hear from you in a few days, and oblige your friend &c."

Dunn proceeded to testify, further, that on receipt of this letter, he communicated its contents to Mr. Daniel (May's counsel) and informed him, that the award had already been made and returned: that he also conferred with the other arbitrator, Smith, who said he had already had trouble enough with the business, and should 365 do nothing more in it: *that he informed May, that the award had been made and returned before his letter was received: that afterwards, and before February term 1830, May exhibited evidence to him, which if it had been shewn him before he made the award, would have intirely changed his opinion, unless it had been counteracted by other evidence: that he asked May why this evidence had not been sooner exhibited; and he said he had overlooked it, and had not found it till after his first appearance before the arbitrators: that the opinion of the arbitrators was formed, principally, on the evidence of a single witness (Anderson) upon a particular point in controversy, which it was necessary to settle before they entered into any investigation of the papers laid before them: that when the parties were before the arbitrators, they both expressed a wish, that the arbitrators should proceed to decide the case at once, upon the evidence then adduced; neither party intimating that he had any further evidence to offer; and May expressing his willingness that the decision should be made, if it should be made when he was in Richmond and present, though he said, at the same time, he should have been glad to have Binford's evidence: that the claim preferred by Yancey, which May alleged that Binford's evidence was necessary to explain, was in fact allowed to Yancey by the arbitrators; it was an item in his account of eleven dollars: that when the parties were before the arbitrators each accused the other of a desire to delay the case. Dunn further testified, that he had informed May, that the award would not be made and returned till near the February term; and it was only in consequence of the earnest request of Yancey, made to the arbitrators when May was not present, that it was concluded and returned sooner.

2. The other arbitrator, Smith, testified, that the parties were both before the arbitrators at their first meeting, from which they adjourned to the Washington tavern: that the witnesses were examined in the presence of the parties, and the papers of both were exhibited; and May handed in a 366 paper containing his views of the case: that he (Smith) believed *that all the evidence was before the arbitrators, otherwise he would not have proceeded to an award; he understood that both parties left the arbitrators, with the expectation that the award would be made upon the evidence and explanations then given; and the arbitrators agreed to proceed to make up the award as soon as they could, without any further meeting of the parties, or explanation from them: that, according to his recollection, no formal proposition was made by May, that the award should not be made up during his absence from Richmond, and he expressed no wish to be heard again; he thought he should remember such a circumstance, if it had occurred; he remembered, that May said he would be glad to have Binford's testimony, but he did not ask a continuance for the purpose of procuring it, and he appeared to be willing to go on with the case, without Binford's testimony: that the evidence was examined first by him, and then by Dunn, separately, till the mind of each was satisfied: that it was true the award was made up sooner than otherwise it would have been, in consequence of the importunities of Yancey; but he was not permitted to converse with them on the merits; he once commenced a conversation of the kind with Smith, but Smith stopped him, and he did not attempt it again.

Upon this evidence, the hustings court overruled May's motion to set aside the award, and entered judgments according to it. May appealed to the circuit court of Henrico, which affirmed the judgments. And then he applied to this court for writs of supersedeas; which were allowed.

Daniel and Johnson, for the plaintiff in error, said, that the courts had been very liberal in their indulgence to awards, in respect of mistakes of fact, or even of law, imputed to the arbitrators; but in cases in which awards were impugned on ground of misbehaviour of the arbitrators, they had proceeded on different principles, and examined the conduct of arbitrators with great strictness. It was not necessary to convict them of corruption, or of any 367 decided *partiality. If the arbitrators do any thing improper, or omit to do what propriety requires; if they hear evidence they ought not to hear, or refuse to hear proper evidence when offered; if they fail to perform any of their functions; and, particularly, if they act in such a manner as to surprize either party, and thus in effect to do him injustice; in such cases of misbehaviour, they said, the award ought to be set aside. They cited Burton v. Knight, 2 Vern. 514; Harris v. Mitchell, Id. 485; Smith v. Coryton, cited in Earle v. Stocker, Id. 251; Walker v. Frobisher, 6 Ves. 70, and Graham's adm'r v. Pence, 6 Rand. 529. And they endeavoured to shew, that the conduct of the arbitrators, in this case, had had the effect of a surprize upon May; for, they argued, it had given him reason to expect, that he should have an opportunity of being heard again, before the award was finally made up. And the only reason which induced the arbitrators to disappoint that expectation, was the importunity of Yancey, in the absence of May. It was wrong in them to listen to his importunities; much more to yield to them, after they had given May reason to expect a further hearing. It appeared too, that Yancey had commenced a conversation with the arbitrator Smith alone, on the merits, which Smith put a stop to. because he thought it improper; but he must have said enough to shew, that what he was saying was not proper for the arbitrator to hear; and so far, at least, that arbitrator heard that which it was improper that he should have heard, and which might have had an undue influence on his mind.

Gustavus Myers and Scott, for the defendant in error, entered into a minute examination of the evidence of the arbitrators, concerning their own proceedings, and maintained that there was no colour for the charge of impropriety in their conduct. Their argument turned, almost entirely on questions of fact; for, they said, every case of this kind must stand on its own peculiar circumstances, so that the adjudication of one case afforded no rule for the decision of another; and hence it would be found, that the authorities, 368 *cited for the appellant were wholly inapplicable. They cited Ringer v. Joyse, 1 Marsh. 404.

CARR, J. I have examined the evidence of the arbitrators with great care, and I cannot discover any thing in their conduct, which, according to the principles laid down in Graham v. Pence, and the cases there cited, can be held to amount to misbehaviour. In the case of Walker v. Frobisher, cited at the bar, the arbitrator, after hearing a good deal of evidence, gave notice to the parties, that he should hear no more, in which they acquiesced; but, afterwards, he examined three witnesses on one side, of which he gave no notice to the other party; and for this lord Eldon (while he acquitted the arbitrator of all intentional wrong) decided, that, on general principles, the award must be set aside. In Graham v. Pence, the arbitrators had a meeting, and the defendant asked a continuance for an absent witness, which the arbitrators granted, and then determined to have nothing further to do with the case, and drew up a writing to that effect, which they communicated to the parties; but, afterwards, the plaintiff had a private, ex parte conversation with one of the arbitrators, and prevailed on him to resume the arbitration, and then gave notice to the defendant to attend at a certain time and place: the defendant went, and protested against the arbitrators acting further: he said they had divested themselves of all authority, and that they must return that fact to the court; and so left them. They notwithstanding this went on, and made up an award against the defendant without having his defence, or evidence before them; and for this the court set aside their award. But what have the arbitrators done, in the case before us, which in any respect resembles this? what act that looks like partiality or a departure from duty? The parties were before them; had a full hearing; submitted their evidence, and were willing that the award should then be made. The arbitrators, however, were not ready: they required time to satisfy themselves. Dunn says, that May 369 expressed a wish, that if the *arbitrators did not decide before he left Richmond (he living in Staunton) they should not make up their award until he could be again before them; but Dunn's understanding of this was, not that he wished to introduce further evidence, but merely to make further remarks and explanations. Smith, the other arbitrator, says, that he heard no wish expressed by May, to be heard again, and that he does not think he could have forgotten such a circumstance; that both parties left the arbitrators with the expectation that the award would be formed upon the evidence and the explanations then given; and both arbitrators agree, that they gave no promise, nor appointed any future time, for another hearing. Now, suppose Dunn's recollection perfectly accurate, to what does it amount? merely, that May wished (if they did not then decide) to make further arguments before them. Did this wish impose an obligation on the arbitrators, to hear him further? Surely not, unless they should find it necessary to their decision. But the arbitrators agree, that their first intention was to make up the award, so as to be ready for the February term of the hustings court; and that they, being much pressed by Yancey, departed from this intention, and made it on the 16th January. Was there any misbehaviour in this? I cannot think so. Yancey had no conversation with them on the subject matter of the arbitration: he merely expressed the wish, that whatever was to be done, might be done without delay: he claimed a sum of money, which to him, no doubt, seemed considerable: he had been at law for it many years: and under these circumstances (though it might not be very delicate) it was quite natural, that he should press to have the business finished. But the arbitrators do not intimate, that this urgency caused them, to hurry over or slight the business at all. The first hearing, when the parties were before them, was in the first week of December; and they did not make their award till the 16th January, nearly six weeks after. Surely, this was time enough; and they tell us, they had the documents, first before the one, and then the other, till they were 370 satisfied; and *then met, and made the award. As to the letter written by May to Dunn, that can have no effect on the case. It was not written till the 25th January, sometime after the award was made and returned to the clerk's office; and even in that letter, he speaks of no new evidence. It consists almost intirely of a long argument on the merits of the case, very improperly addressed to one of the arbitrators. As little influence is due to the declaration of Dunn, that May had since shewn him evidence, which, if it had been before him, would have changed his opinion, unless counteracted by other evidence; for, in the first place, the question before us, is as to the misbehaviour of the arbitrators, upon which this evidence, never before them, can have no bearing; and secondly, if we could be at all influenced by this evidence, it ought to have been filed in the cause. We can never agree, to take the opinion of the arbitrator as to it. Upon the whole, I can see nothing like misbehaviour in the arbitrators, or injustice to the defendant, and am clear that the judgments should be affirmed.

CABELL and BROOKE, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P., said, he inclined to the opinion, that the judgments were erroneous; but as the other judges were clearly of opinion that they were right, and as the question, in his view of it, was a question of fact on the evidence, it was unnecessary to assign the reasons on which his impressions were founded.

Judgments affirmed.

371 *Harrisons v. Harrison's Adm'r and Others.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Insurance on House—To Whom It Belongs—Liability of Sureties of Administrator.—A house is insured against fire, as being leasehold property, held for a term of 99 years renewable forever; it was, in fact, held by the assured in fee simple; after the death of the assured, it is destroyed by fire: HELD, the money due for the loss belonged to the heirs of the assured, and his administrator having received it, the sureties of the administrator are not responsible for it.

Obadiah Harrison late of Petersburg deceased, in his lifetime, made a declaration for the insurance of a house in that town, in the Mutual Assurance Society against fire on buildings of the state of Virginia, in which declaration he described his estate in the property as being a term of ninety-nine years renewable forever, whereas, in fact, he was seized of a fee simple estate in the property; and he effected a policy of assurance with the society, which, referring to the declaration by him made for insurance, bound the society to make good, to him, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, all losses or damages which should happen to the house by accidental fire &c. The policy was a covenant under the seal of the society. Some years after the policy was effected, Harrison died, and Samuel Christian took letters of administration of his estate, and gave an administration bond, in which Donald M'Kenzie and John Osborne were bound as his sureties. Afterwards, in March 1819, the house was destroyed by fire; and the sum of 439 dollars, the net estimated loss, was paid by the society to Christian the administrator.

Upon a bill exhibited in the superior court of chancery of Richmond, by Harrison's children and distributees against Christian the administrator and M'Kenzie and Osborne his sureties, praying a settlement of Christian's accounts of administration, and a decree against him and his sureties for the balance which should be found due from him to his intestate's estate, —the main question was, whether the 372 money *due from the Mutual Assurance Society upon the policy, and received by Christian, belonged of right to him as the administrator of Harrison, or to Harrison's heirs? If it belonged to Christian as the administrator of the assured, then his sureties in the administration bond were responsible to the distributees, for his due administration thereof; if it belonged to the heirs of the assured, the sureties of the administrator were nowise bound for it to the heirs.

*Insurance.—See monographic note on "Insurance. Fire & Marine" appended to Mut. Assur. Society v. Holt. 20 Gratt. 612.

The chancellor was of opinion, that the money due on the policy of assurance belonged to the heirs of the assured, not to his administrator; and that, consequently, the sureties of the administrator were nowise responsible for it; and it appearing by the accounts of Christian's administration, that there were no other moneys due from the administrator, for which his sureties could be held responsible to the distributees, he dismissed the bill as to the sureties. The Harrisons applied by petition to this court, for an appeal from the decree; which was allowed.

Spooner, for the appellant.

No counsel for the appellee.

TUCKER, P. The appeal being from the dismissal of the bill as to the sureties, and nothing more, Christian is out of the case here. As to the insurance money: the house, it is true, was insured by mistake, as leasehold property. The title of the assured was in fact a fee simple. The policy was, therefore, a covenant for the protection of real estate, though it was by mistake described as a term of years renewable forever. The covenant followed the title to the property, and on the death of Harrison, the assured, devolved to his heirs, for they are expressly named in the policy. The Mutual Assurance Society covenanted to Harrison, his heirs &c. and he bound himself, his heirs &c. to the society. This covenant being broken after Harrison's death, the right to the insurance money was in his heirs. The administrator Christian 373 having received what belonged *to the heirs, he is debtor for the amount to them, not to his intestate's estate. Therefore, the sureties bound in his administration bond are nowise responsible for it. On this point, this court approves the chancellor's decree.

The decree was, however, reversed upon some trivial points of mere detail in the report of the administration account in regard to which exceptions had been taken by the appellants, and overruled by the court; and the cause was remanded with directions in relation thereto.

Heywood v. Covington's Heirs.

April, 1838.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Bill for Specific Execution—Effect Where Cause is Still Pending in Lower Court—Case at Bar.—In a suit in the county court in chancery between the heirs of a decedent, the court decrees, that a mill, whereof partition can no otherwise be made, shall be sold by commissioners on a credit of twelve months; the commissioners make the sale and report it; the court, after the twelve months elapsed, confirm the report, and order the commissioners to convey to the purchaser; then, a conveyance is tendered to the purchaser, who refuses to complete the purchase, the mill having been carried away by a fresh within the twelve months; and while the cause is yet pending in the county court, the heirs exhibit a bill in the superior court of chancery against the purchaser for specific execution: HELD, that as the cause in the county court was still pending, this bill in the superior court could not be entertained.

Judicial Sales—Change in Value of Property before Confirmation.—Quære, whether the purchaser is bound to bear the loss arising to the property from the fresh, within the twelve months, and before the report of sale was confirmed?

William Covington late of Chesterfield, died intestate, seized of a mill and mill seat on Swift creek, and some other real estate, in that county, and leaving six children his heirs at law. The property was so situated, that a fair and equal division thereof could only be made by selling the mill and mill seat, and dividing the proceeds of sale among the parceners; and in a suit 374 in chancery in the county court *of Chesterfield, in which some of them were plaintiffs, and the others defendants, the county court, satisfied that a sale of this property was the only means of making a just division of the estate, decreed, that the mill and mill seat should be sold at auction, on a credit of twelve months, and that the proceeds of the sale should be divided among the parties according to the statute of descents; and appointed commissioners to make the sale and to divide the proceeds accordingly. The commissioners sold the mill and mill seat, in pursuance of the decree, and made report thereof to the court, in which it was stated, that John Boast was the purchaser, at the price of 610 dollars. And after twelve months had elapsed and the purchase money had become due, the court made another interlocutory order, directing the commissioners to execute a deed conveying the property to the purchaser or purchasers at the sale, and to make a report of their proceedings in order to a final decree. The commissioners thereupon executed a conveyance to Boast, the purchaser mentioned in their report of sale; and most of the heirs of Covington executed another deed, conveying the property to Boast and Joseph Heywood, who, as they understood, had in fact been jointly concerned with Boast in the purchase at the sale made by the commissioners. The deed of the commissioners to Boast, was tendered to him. But, in the interval between the sale made by the commissioners, and the interlocutory order of the court directing them to make a conveyance of the property, the mill dam had been swept away, and the mill house removed from its scite, by a fresh; and therefore Boast refused to accept the conveyance tendered to him, and complete the purchase. The commissioners made no report to the court of their proceedings under the last order; nor were any further proceedings ever had in the cause, which remained, and yet remains, in the county court, undetermined, and neglected by the parties.

Judicial Sales—Cause Pending in Chancery Court—Jurisdiction. In Taylor v. Cooper, 10 Leigh 320, it is said by TUCKER, P., before confirmation of the report, and while the cause is yet pending in the court of chancery, I am of opinion that to that tribunal alone can the purchaser resort for the adjustment of his rights and the enforcement of his claim. Such was the case of Crews v. Pendleton, 1 Leigh 297, and Heywood v. Covington, 4 Leigh 373. See

But the heirs of Covington exhibited their bill against Boast and Heywood in the superiour court of chancery of 375 *Richmond, setting forth all the proceedings in the cause in the county court; charging, that, though it appeared by the report of sale made by the commissioners, that the property had been sold to Boast alone, yet Heywood was in fact his partner in the purchase, jointly and equally interested therein; and praying a decree for specific execution of the contract of purchase against both, if in truth they were joint purchasers, or if Boast was the sole purchaser, against him alone.

Boast and Heywood put in a joint answer, in which they stated, that Boast was the sole purchaser at the commissioners' sale, and that it was afterwards agreed between Boast and Heywood, that the latter should be jointly and equally interested in the purchase: that they were, at the time, anxious and ready to complete the purchase immediately; and they applied, repeatedly, both to the commissioners and to Covington's heirs, to make a conveyance of the title, and had deeds prepared to be executed by them, respectively, conveying the same; but neither the commissioners, nor the parties interested, paid any attention to this request, for more than twenty months, and not until the mill dam and the mill had been so injured by a fresh, that it would have required an expenditure of 500 dollars to put them in such a state of repair as to make them fit for use: and that, in consequence of the neglect of the vendors to complete the purchase on their part, by making a conveyance of the title, the vendees had never taken possession of the property, and thought themselves now exempted from any obligation to complete the purchase on their part. And, finally, they pleaded the statute of frauds.

The depositions taken in the cause, left it somewhat doubtful, whether Heywood was originally jointly concerned with Boast in the purchase at the commissioners' sale, or whether Boast was originally the sole purchaser, and Heywood became jointly interested in the purchase by a subsequent verbal agreement between him and Boast?

But upon the whole, it appeared, that, 376 though Boast alone appeared *as bidder at the sale, Heywood was, from the first, jointly interested with him in the purchase.

The chancellor declaring that the plaintiffs were entitled to demand specific execution of the contract from both the defendants, decreed against them both, that they should pay the plaintiffs the purchase money, 610 dollars, with interest from the date when it should have been paid &c. And Heywood applied, by petition, to this court, for an appeal from the decree; which was allowed.

Spooner for the appellant, insisted, 1. That, under the circumstances of the case, the plaintiffs were not entitled to a specific execution; they having been themselves in default, in not promptly executing the contract, and in not taking any step towards the execution of it, on their part, till the property had been most materially injured, and rendered almost valueless.

2. That the vendors ought to bear the loss arising from the injury to the property by the freshes, in the interval between the sale by the commissioners and the confirmation of their report of sale by the county court. And 3. That, seeing that the suit in the county court was still pending there and undetermined, and involved the whole subject in controversy, the superiour court of chancery could not properly entertain this bill.

There was no counsel for the appellees.

TUCKER, P. If the mill and mill dam were materially injured by freshes, after the sale and before the report of sale was confirmed, I should think, upon the authorities, that the loss should not fall upon the vendee, provided there was no fault in him. In Davy v. Barber, 2 Atk. 489, Blount v. Blount, 3 Id. 636-8, it was held, that a purchaser must pay for lives falling in; if so, he cannot be charged with losses. And in ex parte Minor, 11 Ves. 559, and Twigg v. Fifield, 13 Id. 517, it was held, that the purchaser ought to be considered as having the purchase only from the time of the confirmation of the report of 377 sale. But in *Anson v. Towgood, 1

Jac. & Walk. 619, lord Eldon said the confirmation of the report related back, and thus unsettled the doctrine in Twigg v. Fifield. And see the course it behooves the purchaser to pursue to confirm his purchase, Sugd. Law Vend. 39, 40.* So that it is possible the purchaser, in this case may not be absolved. But the point cannot now be determined; for the case is clearly coram non judice. The superiour court of chancery could not entertain the bill, pending the suit in the county court. Therefore, the decree must be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

Hardman v. Boardman.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Caveat—Right of Senior Patentee to File.—Upon the construction of the 38th section of the general land law, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 86, HELD, that a person holding a perfect legal title to lands by grant from the commonwealth, may maintain a caveat to prevent the issuing of a junior grant to another person.

Daniel Boardman entered a caveat in the land office, against the issuing of a grant to Jacob Hardman for 150 acres of land lying in the county of Lewis, upon a survey made for Hardman and returned to the land office, "because he (Boardman) had Caveat—Right of Senior Patentee to File.—In Clements v. Kyles, 18 Gratt. 473, LEE, J., in his opinion, said, under the influence of the cases of Harvey v. Preston, 3 Call 496, Tanner v. Sadler, 2 Hen. & M. 370, and Hardman v. Boardman, 4 Leigh 377, in all of which a caveat was sustained on the basis of a complete legal title in the caveator, either actually shown or presumed in its favor and of the settled and long continued practice during the period within there have been two revivals of our statute of law without change upon this subject. It must be regarded as no longer a debate of a matter and considered as now fully settled that a party may enforce a complete legal title by caveat against another seeking to obtain a new grant for the same land. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in foot-note to Harvey v. Preston, 3 Call 496; Johnson v. Brown, 3 Call 259.

a better right to the land included in the survey," the same having been included in a large survey of 3000 acres, which had been regularly granted to Robert Means by patent dated the 7th May 1795, and by Means conveyed to Boardman, before Hardman's survey, or even the entry was made, on which the survey was founded. Boardman was a citizen and resident of New York; and the caveat was admitted by the register, upon the affidavit, not of Boardman himself but of James Arnold (by whom it was entered) as his agent and attorney in fact, that it was

378 "really and bona fide made with the intention of procuring the land for Boardman, in whose name it was entered, and not in trust for Hardman, against whom it was entered."

A copy of the caveat was filed in the circuit court of Lewis; and Hardman having been regularly summoned, appeared to maintain his right to a grant according to his survey; upon which a jury was impaneled to find the material facts that were not agreed by the parties. The jury found, that almost the whole of the parcel of 379 150 acres included "in Hardman's survey, was included in a survey long before made, of 3000 acres, which had been regularly granted to Robert Means, by patent dated the 7th May 1795, and by Means conveyed to Boardman, by deed dated the 10th February 1806. And, thereupon, the circuit court held, that Boardman had better right to such part of the land included within Hardman's survey as was included within the survey and grant under which Boardman claimed; and, therefore, adjudged, that no grant should issue to Hardman for so much of the land included in his survey as belonged of right to Boardman. From this judgment, Hardman appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant, objected, 1. That the caveat was irregularly entered, because the affidavit on which it was admitted by the register, was made by an attorney in fact or agent of the caveator; whereas the 43rd section of the land law required that the proceeding should be founded on the affidavit of the caveator himself. And it was obvious, he said, that the caveator was the only person who could make the proper affidavit; since he alone could know that the caveat was entered with the intention of procuring the land for himself, and not in trust for the benefit of the caveatee. 2. He strenuously contended, that the caveat is a remedy provided for persons who claim inchoate and imperfect rights in unappropriated lands: that it was not intended to be given, and it was nowise necessary it should be given, to persons holding perfect title by patent for the lands in controversy. He remarked, that the 38th section of the statute, which gave the caveat, had respect only to waste or unappropriated lands; that the 42nd section, in providing for the case of a judgment upon the caveat in favor of the caveator, prescribed the method by which he should obtain his grant; that the 47th section also served to shew, that the only effect of a judgment in favor of the caveator, was to enable him to obtain a patent; and that the 43rd section required the caveator to file an affidavit (as the

the caveat is entered with intention to procure the lands for himself; an affidavit, which it would have been absurd to require, if the remedy by caveat was intended for a person who had already procured the land, that is, a regular grant for it. Therefore, he concluded, that the 38th section in giving the caveat to a person who had a better right, intended not a better right by actual patent, but a better right to demand a patent. The remedy was a summary one, not well fitted for an examination of titles, and ought not to be encouraged, in cases where the necessity that induced the legislature to provide it, did not exist. It was also, in its nature, an equitable remedy, devised and intended to enable a party to assert rights which he could not assert by action at law, and to prevent another from acquiring a legal title, by patent, for land, for which the caveator had a superiour equitable right to call for the legal title,—to demand the patent. A junior patent could be of no prejudice to the elder grantee; his elder patent would enable him to maintain his title by an action at law against the junior grantee, or to defend it in an action brought by the junior grantee against him. If, then, this were an open question, he thought the court would have no difficulty in deciding, that the remedy by caveat could not lie for a person claiming a perfect

*The general land law, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 86, § 38, p. 329, provides, that "every person for whom any waste or unappropriated land shall be located and laid off, shall within twelve months at farthest, after the survey made, return the plat and certificate of survey into the land office, and may demand of the register a receipt for the same; and on failing to make such return within twelve months, as aforesaid, or if the breadth of his plat be not one-third of its length, as before directed, it shall be lawful for any other person to enter a caveat in the land office against the issuing any grant to him, expressing therein for what cause the grant should not issue; or if any person shall obtain a survey of land to which another hath by law a better right, the person having such better right, may, in like manner, enter a caveat to prevent his obtaining a grant; such caveat also expressing the nature of the right on which the plaintiff therein claims the said land."

§ 42, after directing the mode of proceeding on the caveat, and trying the question of right between the parties, provides, that "if the judgment be in favor of the plaintiff [in the caveat], upon delivering the same into the land office, together with a plat and certificate of survey, and also producing a legal certificate of new rights on his own account, he shall be entitled to a grant thereof; but on failing to make such return, and produce such certificates, within six months after judgment so rendered, it shall be lawful for any other person to enter a caveat for that cause against issuing the grant; upon which subsequent caveat such proceedings shall be had as are before directed in the case of an original caveat."

§ 43 provides, "that no caveat shall be entered, unless the person, at the time of entering such caveat, shall file with the register, an affidavit, that such caveat is really and bona fide made with an intention of procuring the lands for the person in whose name such caveat is entered, and not in trust for the benefit of the person against whom such caveat is entered; and all caveats entered contrary to the directions of this act, shall be absolutely null and void."

§ 47 provides, that "whenever, upon a caveat, the court shall determine in favor of the caveator, all the fees he shall pay into the register's office, in consequence of such determination, in order to obtain his patent, shall be by the register paid to the person who, in the first instance, upon the return of the survey, hath been compelled to pay the fees."—Note in Original Edition.

title by an elder patent. He was aware, however, that caveats had been maintained by persons claiming under elder grants, and that the proceeding had passed under the revision of this court, and had not been disapproved; Preston v. Harvey, 3 Call 495; Archer v. Sadler, 2 Hen. & Munf. 370; Preston v. Harvey, Id. 55. But as the point was not made in the argument of those cases, and therefore could not have been maturely considered by the court, the authority of the adjudications ought not to be regarded as conclusive.

Leigh, for the appellee, said, the objection to the affidavit, if well founded, ought to have been made in the circuit court; it was too late to make it here. But the affidavit made by the attorney in fact, was well enough; his principal 381 *resided in New York; and the attorney, appointed generally, to take care of his rights, might, very probably, have entered the caveat, even without consulting him, and therefore might have known, with perfect certainty, that the proceeding was intended for the benefit of the caveator, not in trust for the benefit of the caveatee. The only purpose for which the affidavit was required, was to guard against collusion between the caveator and caveatee; and that purpose was fulfilled by this affidavit. A similar objection had been taken to an affidavit made to serve as the foundation of an attachment against an absconding debtor, and overruled, in Kyles v. Connelly, 3 Leigh 719. Then, as to the main question, he said, the point, though it was not argued at the bar, was certainly involved in the two cases of Preston v. Harvey, and in that of Archer v. Sadler; and the court could not possibly have decided those cases as it did, without being of opinion, that a person claiming land by elder patent, was entitled to enter a caveat to prevent another person from obtaining a grant of the same land. The 38th section of the land law provided for two classes of cases; the first, cases in which the person going to the land office for a grant, had, by his own neglect to return his survey in due time, or by getting a survey made contrary to the provisions of the statute, lost his right to demand a grant, whether any other person had a right of any kind to the land, or not; the second, cases in which, though the person seeking the grant had pursued the regular course, some other person had by law better right. The caveat, in the present case, belonged to the latter class. The statute gave the remedy, in express terms, to persons having by law a better right to the land. The elder grantee having a better right, indeed the best and the only right to the land, was entitled to the caveat by the plain letter of the statute. It was a remedy which might be highly beneficial though not absolutely necessary, to him; and, moreover, public policy dictated the propriety of giving it to him. The elder grantee, might, indeed, assert or defend his rights against the junior not prevent the operation of the commonwealth's grant) it was necessary to prevent him from getting a grant. And it behooved the legislature to provide means (it was much to be lamented it had not provided more effectual means) by which the evil of issuing several grants for the same land, might be prevented; for the junior grant, though it might not serve to give the grantee any land, would give him a colourable title, which he might sell in the market. The most liberal construction ought to be given to the 38th section of the land law, in order to advance and extend the remedy. It was true, the provisions of the 42nd, 43rd and 47th sections of the statute, were applicable only to the case of a caveator seeking a grant; but there were many such cases included in the provision of the 38th section, and for which of course it was necessary to provide in the subsequent sections; and the provisions made to enable a successful caveator who had no grant, to procure one, afforded no inference, that a person, who already had a grant, was to be deprived of the remedy by caveat plainly given him by the words of the 38th section.

CARR, J. The first objection taken by the appellant's counsel is, that there was here no such affidavit as is required by the 43rd section of the land law, as the foundation of the proceeding by caveat. The obvious intention of that provision, was to prevent fraudulent combinations and collusion. It does not, in terms, require the oath of the caveator: it requires that the person entering the caveat, shall file an affidavit, that the caveat is made with intention to procure the land for the person in whose name such caveat is entered. Here is a citizen of New York, perhaps never in Virginia, who in 1806, bought of Means, the original grantee, a large tract of land, lying in the extreme western part of the state. It was natural, that he should 383 *employ some one in the part of the country where the land lay, to look after it; this was Arnold. Many years after Boardman's purchase of Means, Hardman enters and surveys the land; and this agent and attorney in fact enters the caveat, and makes oath that it was entered bona fide, and not in trust for the caveatee. Does not this affidavit give to the mind, as strong an assurance that this is in truth a real adversary proceeding, as if the caveator living in New York had made the oath? I confess it does to me; and I think this in principle, very much like the case of Kyles v. Connelly, under the statute authorizing the issuing of attachments on affidavits. It is questionable with me, indeed, whether the party, never having urged this objection before, can be heard, for the first time in the court of last resort; but if he can, he may, at least, be fairly judged by the facts disclosed to us here. Can any body look at this record, and doubt that this is really and truly an adversary proceeding? Would the caveator claiming to hold under a patent, collude with one who had a mere entry and survey? If this was mere collusion, would the caveatee have taken this appeal? I cannot understand the motives which, in a case of collusion, would have dictated such a course.

The other objection strikes at the foundation of the caveat. It is, that a man cannot by caveat, prevent another from obtaining a grant for land, which he himself claims to hold by a perfect legal title. This, I confess had been my impression. Without ever having had my attention particularly drawn to the subject, I had taken it for granted, that the caveat law was meant solely to try imperfect titles. The provision of the statute, however, is very broad. It divides caveats into two classes: 1. If a party fails to return his plat and certificate within twelve months, or if the breadth be not one-third of its length, any person may enter a caveat; this is the first class, in which no right is claimed for the caveator, but he relies wholly on some imperfection in the works of the caveatee: 2. Or "if any person shall obtain a survey of land, to which another hath by law a better

384 *right, the person having such better right, may, in like manner, enter a caveat to prevent his obtaining a grant, until the title can be determined." The better right here spoken of, is in no manner defined. He has a better right, who holds by patent, than he who has only his entry and survey. The case, therefore, must be admitted to fall within the letter of the statute. We must admit too, that it could never have been the intention of the legislature, to suffer two patents for the same land, to issue to different persons. However ineffectual the guards against this abuse may have proved (and they have been deplorably so) it is very clear, that the legislature meant, in good faith, to sell to adventurers, none but waste and unappropriated land. I can well imagine also, more than one reason, which should make it desirable to the holder of land, to prevent other patents issuing for it, though he might believe that his own was valid and covered it. But yet if this were res integra, I should feel some doubt which construction was the true one. But I do consider the case as so far adjudicated, that I am by no means willing to disturb it. In Preston v. Harvey, 3 Call 427, the caveator stood expressly upon the ground of his patent; that was the better right, on which he entered his caveat; and the court expressly so stated it. Thus judge Roane says "The object [of the caveat] is to protect the appellee's title to 187 acres of land, which he claimed by patent" &c. In the second case of Preston v. Harvey, the caveator, in like manner, stated his better title to be a patent; and the court came to the same conclusion, on the same ground. So in Archer v. Sadler, the caveator rested wholly upon his deeds, and the long possession under them, which, he insisted, authorized the presumption of a patent; and the judges all argue that point, and come to the conclusion, that he must be considered as holding under a patent. It was said, that the point was never raised in these cases: true, but why? The counsel were very able, and the cases were argued with great zeal, talent and learning; the judges seem to have examined the subject 385 with great care: why was it, *that this point occurred to not one of them? Nay more, that in the last case, they laboured with all their might to prove that the caveator should be presumed to have a patent, which, according to the doctrine now contended for, would have sufficed to turn him out of court? All this could only have been upon the ground, that they considered the law too clear, on this point, to suggest a doubt. I am, therefore, for affirming the judgment.

CABELL, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. I do not think there is any thing in the objection, that the affidavit that the caveat was bona fide, was made by the agent instead of the party himself. But I am of opinion, that the caveat ought to have been dismissed, as the caveator had a patent for the land in controversy.

This case brings into discussion, for the first time, the question, whether a person who has already obtained his patent, can sustain a caveat against any other person, who is proceeding regularly to obtain a grant for the same land, on the ground of better right. I say it is the first time; for though it was fairly presented, and might very well have been brought into discussion, in Preston v. Harvey and Archer v. Sadler, yet it was not so discussed. The objection seems to have occurred to no one, and it is readily admitted to have been taken for granted, that such a proceeding was regular. Our experience, however, admonishes us, that little confidence is to be placed in opinions thus loosely taken up; and this very case is a striking illustration of the truth. For, of those who have come into the discussion, and of those to whom the argument has been addressed, the greater part have always been under the contrary impression. For my own part, though I have been aware of the cases which have been cited, I never did hear—in the course of the discharge of my official duties in the western part of this state, where this subject is as familiarly understood as 386 *the alphabet—I never did hear the caveat considered in any other light, than as a proceeding invented by the statute, for bringing before a competent tribunal, a comparison of equities: I never did hear it spoken of as a proper remedy for a patentee, who having covered himself already with the title of the commonwealth, certainly needed no assistance from this summary remedy. It is much to be regretted, that our books furnish us so few cases on the subject, and that we have not access to the Kentucky reports, in which we could trace back the interpretation of this law, almost to the time when it began first to be put into operation. We are driven therefore to our own resources. We must look to the statute itself; its motives, its design, its plan and its provisions.

Until the revolution, the lands west of the Alleghany were locked up from the adventurer. The large quantities of waste and unappropriated lands in that part of the state, induced the legislature in 1779, to pass the statute of that year for the granting of those lands, with a view to encourage emigration, promote population, increase the revenue, and create a fund for discharging the public debt. A land office was accordingly opened; and, as its provisions were calculated to flood the western country with adventurers, each of whom had a right to pick and choose for himself out of this immense wilderness, it was easy to foresee that innumerable litigations and conflicts of title would be the consequence. Against this the legislature, which certainly had more foresight of evil than prudence in guarding against it, anxiously provided. The anticipation of what was to happen appears from the preamble to one of the provisions of the statute; which was introduced with these words—"and for preventing hasty and surreptitious grants and avoiding controversies and expensive law suits, be it enacted" &c. It was, precisely, with the object of providing a mode of settling the innumerable controversies, which were obviously to arise between the innumerable competitors in this race for patents, that the caveat law was enacted.

387 *It was not enacted with a view to provide for the trial of legal titles completed by patent; for the ordinary provisions of the common law in relation to these, had never been found deficient. It was enacted—the caveat tribunal was created—for the purpose of comparing the equities of persons who were both in pursuit of grants for the same piece of land, and of deciding which had the better right. This very expression carries much meaning to my mind. The words right and better right, in connexion with the progress of the adventurer in pursuit of lands, have, I think, always had something of a technical signification. In our land law, I understand right and better right, as contradistinguished from, instead of comprehending, title by patent. As early as 1705, we hear of importation rights and settlement rights; and the laws provided, in case of not seating and planting, that the party should not only forfeit his grant, but also the rights on which it was founded; here using the terms in opposite senses. And in the acts of 1779, we hear of importation rights, settlement rights, military rights, treasury rights: we find the word used, in a thousand instances, to designate merely that equitable interest which the claimant had to the lands for which he desired to procure a patent. The statute of May 1779, ch. 4, is full of the use of the term in this technical sense; so also is the statute of May 1779, ch. 5, establishing the land office; both of these statutes, indeed, forming obviously but one act.

It was for the settlement of controversies respecting these rights that the caveat law was made; it was for the speedy determination of the question, whose unpatented right was the better right, that this summary proceeding was instituted; for, until the decision of that question, the register could not know to which party to issue the patent, and until the patent was issued, no taxes were paid, and the resources of the state were consequently impaired. How far this consideration mingled, in our legislation, with paternal care for the interest of the adventurers in the land lottery, will appear from the preamble to the 4th ch. 29, 2 Rev. Code, p. 401, which recites the existence of the practice of fraudulent and collusive caveats, "whereby much lands are covered from taxation."

That the object of the legislature was merely to settle conflicting entries, I think is strongly indicated by a passage in the opinion of the venerable president of this court, in the case of Johnson v. Brown, 3 Call 267. "It was foreseen, says he, by the legislature, that there would be interfering entries and surveys; and the caveat was the remedy for settling all those disputes prior to the patent, to avoid the inconvenience of that solemn instrument being involved in contests of that kind." It was a remedy not wanted by the patentee; for the patent was a shield to him against every thing but a bill in equity. His case could not, therefore, have been in the eye of the legislature, as he needed no such aid; and if he was not to have aid from the proceedings, there was no conceivable motive for comprehending his case within the provision. The provision, indeed, had its root in the ante-revolutionary course of proceeding, for some recollections of which we are indebted to the industry of Mr. Leigh, in the compilation of laws prepared under his care. In 2 Rev. Code, p. 340, § 8, he refers to the act of 1732, ch. 11, § 10, 12, which recites, that controversies frequently arose concerning priority of entries for lands, and the rights to patents for them, which were properly cognizable before the governor and council, and makes certain provisions for witnesses &c. with a proviso, that the act should not be construed to give the council board power to hold plea of any matter properly cognizable before the courts of law; "plainly shewing," as he truly says, "that the proceeding by way of caveat (though, in its nature, strictly judicial) was had before the council sitting as an executive body, and not as judges sitting in the general court;" and plainly shewing, I will add, that this prototype of the caveat law, altogether excluded the idea of that board holding cognizance of any dispute between patentees, or a patentee on one hand and the holder of an entry on the other.

389 *From this seedling our caveat law sprung; and unless the contrary clearly appears, we must take it that the stock is of the same character with that from which it has been derived. The caveat law is an invasion of the ordinary course of common law proceedings. Upon familiar principles, it will be extended no farther than the legislative enactments will clearly justify. And as, anterior to the enactment of it, the analogous tribunal was tied down to disputes about priority of entries and the rights to patents, we cannot, without strong language, attribute to the caveat court, the power of deciding upon cases where patent rights are involved; and thus encounter "the inconvenience of having those solemn instruments involved in contests of that kind," and decided by a proceeding as summary and informal as those of a pie poudre court.

Let us then see, what there is in the provisions of the law, to justify the proposition, that a patentee may caveat upon the ground of better right than the caveatee. I say, upon the ground of better right; because there are four causes stated in the land law, which authorize the entering of a caveat: 1. failing to return the plat and certificate of survey in due time; 2. disproportion between the length and breadth of survey; 3. a better right on the part of the caveator; and 4. the failure to deliver a copy of the judgment in a caveat cause to the register in due time. Of the two first and fourth causes, it has been supposed any person may take advantage, whether he has interest in the matter or not. The third, with which we have concern, rests upon the ground of better right. As to this, it is provided, that "if any person shall obtain a survey of lands to which another hath by law a better right, the person having such better right may in like manner enter a caveat." This term better right, I have already said, I understand in reference to and in connexion with the various species of rights, before mentioned in the statute, not yet carried into grant. It seems to me to be the natural understanding. Our legislature was not in the habit of using that word right

390 to signify *complete title by patent; while, on the other hand, the examples are infinite, of the use of that term to designate rights not perfected by patent. Nor do I think it reasonable to suppose, that they designedly used one term to comprehend two different if not opposite things; namely, complete and incomplete rights—in other words, patents, and surveys not carried into grant; especially, if the legislature really designed so great an innovation upon the ante-revolutionary statute, which expressly inhibited that solemn instrument, a patent, from being involved in a contest of this summary character. Had such been the design of the legislature, it would have distinctly provided, that if any person should obtain a survey of lands, for which another hath a patent, or a better right by law, the person having such better right, might enter a caveat &c. But, instead of such an enactment, we have the phrase better right alone, which according to the construction contended for is to serve a double purpose; to cover two kinds of interests intirely distinct; thus introducing, obviously, the greatest confusion in the residue of the provisions in relation to the caveat. For, in another section of the statute, it is provided, that if the judgment is in favor of the plaintiff, upon producing a copy of it and also producing a certificate of new rights on his own account, he shall be entitled to a grant thereof. Now, this is altogether intelligible when applied to a candidate for a patent. The certificate of new rights, which he must produce, is a certificate of survey in his own behalf, founded upon prior entry and warrant; and upon producing these, he is entitled to a grant. But how can the patent caveator be intended here? How can he have new rights?—a new survey upon a new entry and warrant on the land, which he already holds securely by patent? How is he to be entitled to a grant thereof, when he has a grant already? To avoid these difficulties, it was said, that this part of the statute respects those only whose better right has not been carried into grant. And, thus, though the first part of the clause is construed to be general, the latter part

391 is restricted to *one particular class of cases, while no sort of provision is made for that class, which particularly required provision, if indeed it was comprehended. To understand this, let us see the operation, or rather the want of operation, of this litigation upon the rights of the parties: let us see how completely both will retire from the forensic battle, with their labour for their pains. Each will have spent his money in the pursuit of the phantom of justice, and the victor and the vanquished will find themselves pretty much where they were. Take, first, the caveator: suppose he succeeds, the judgment will only be that he hath the better right, and the utmost that can flow from this judgment, is, that he will arrest the emanation of the patent to the caveatee. How is he benefited by this? The emanation of the patent could do him no harm; for if it should emanate, it would be junior to his, and would therefore give way to him in a court of law. He has no reason to fear such an adversary except in equity. There, indeed, the junior patentee may file a bill, alleging that his entry and survey were prior, and demanding the conveyance of the legal title from the patentee. Will the judgment upon the caveat be a bar to any such demand in equity? I see no reason to suppose it; for if so, then we must take it for granted, that notwithstanding the caveator goes into the caveat court upon his grant, yet the parties are to go behind the grant, and compare the equities. Can this be so? Can it have been designed that this solemn instrument should have been involved in a contest in this summary proceeding, in which its foundations were to be examined, and the proceedings which led to it sifted and scrutinized, and this without any intimation from his adversary by pleading, caveat, or otherwise, of the rotten part of his case? Better a great deal have permitted any person who wished to take up land to caveat a patentee (absurd as it would be in itself) for then he would at least have notice where he was to be attacked. But again; if, notwithstanding the patent, the equities are to be compared, why is it that a caveat, however well begun, must be dismissed, if the

392 caveatee *gets a patent? Hunter v. Hall, 1 Call 206; Guerrant v. Bagby, 6 Munf. 160. Why not permit the parties to go on to sift the equities? The answer is, because the object of the caveat is frustrated. But why did not the legislature provide a power in the caveat court to vacate a patent, thus surreptitiously obtained, by its judgment? The only reason that can be given, is that it did not design to vest this important power in a tribunal acting so summarily. Further, if, as we are now supposing, the equities are to be compared, and the patent is not to be conclusive, why is it that after comparing the equities, and after establishing the superiority of his own entry, the junior claimant, the caveatee, cannot have the effect of his victory? All the judgment he can have,

is a judgment to vacate the caveat, not to vacate the patent also. And by the vacation of the caveat, all the advantage he gets, is to take out his patent, which, being junior, must, in all courts of law, be held inferior to that of his adversary, and he must at last be driven into equity, to prove a second time the superiority of his equitable title. No—if patentees may be caveators, I have no hesitation in saying, that the caveatee should not be permitted to go behind the patent in the caveat court. And if the equities are not compared;—if the legal title is to predominate; then, of course, the judgment in favor of the caveator is no bar to the assertion of the caveatee's claim in equity. Thus, we are brought back to the position, that though the caveator succeeds in his caveat, his judgment will only prevent the emanation of a patent which he cannot fear, and still leave him exposed to an equity, which he well may dread. Then, as to the caveatee, I have already anticipated his condition after his victory. If the legal title is to prevail, whatever may be the state of the comparative equities, then it is obvious, that he must fail in the caveat, and be driven into equity. But, even if the practice under this novel construction of the law should prevail, of allowing the caveatee to go behind the patent of the caveator; yet, if he succeeds, he can have no judgment, to vacate the patent; and after 393 *a vexatious law suit, he finds himself at the beginning of the race. He must now go into equity to establish his title again. I cannot, I acknowledge, perceive any reason, upon such scanty grounds, to recognize a proceeding, which ascertains nothing, decides nothing.

I will only add a concluding remark upon the subject of the phrase better right. If it stood alone, there might be more ground for the pretension, that it is broad enough to comprehend patents as well as other rights. But when the statute speaks of a survey of land being obtained, "to which another hath by law a better right," is not this expression demonstrative, that the legislature was looking to those unperfected rights, which the party held by law, instead of that perfect, complete, and indisputable title, which he held by patent?

Upon the whole, I am of opinion, that the judgment should be reversed, and the caveat dismissed; but the opinion of the court is, that the judgment be affirmed.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Debt on Injunction Bond—Evidence*—Admissibility of Record of the Injunction Cause.—In debt on an injunction bond, the declaration in assigning breach, alleges that the injunction was dissolved by the superior court of chancery; plea, conditions performed; a trial, plaintiff offers the record of the injunction cause in evidence, whereby it appears the injunction was awarded by the county court in August 1814, dissolved in July 1820, and bill dismissed in September 1820; and in November 1820, leave was given to the plaintiff in equity to reinstate the injunction, and amend the bill, and the amended bill was filed and answered; afterwards, the cause is removed by certiorari to the superior court of chancery, which dissolved the injunction awarded by the county court in August 1814, not that awarded in November 1820—and an objection being taken to the record as evidence, on the ground that the injunction awarded in August 1814, had been finally and conclusively dissolved by the county court, and so was not and could not be dissolved by the superior court, and, therefore, that there was a variance between the record offered in evidence, and the allegation, of the breach in the declaration, the objection was overruled, and the record admitted in evidence: HOLD, the record was properly admitted in evidence.

Debt on bond with collateral condition, in the county court of Campbell, brought by Crenshaw's administrator against Arthur surviving obligor of one Calloway and himself.

The declaration,—after demanding the penalty of the bond, and alleging the execution thereof on the 17th November 1814, by Calloway and Arthur to Crenshaw (assignee of M. Anthony) in his lifetime,—set out the condition in hac verba, as follows: "The condition of the above obligation is such, that whereas the said Calloway has obtained an injunction to stay proceedings on a judgment recovered against him in the county court of Campbell by the said Crenshaw assignee as aforesaid, amounting to 445 dollars, but to be discharged by the payment of 222 dollars with interest &c.—if, therefore, the said Calloway and Arthur, their heirs, executors or administrators, shall well and truly pay the said Crenshaw assignee as aforesaid, his executors &c. the amount of the judgment &c. and all costs and damages which shall be awarded against them in case the 395 *injunction aforesaid should be dissolved, then the obligation to be void" &c. And then the declaration assigned as a breach of the condition, that the injunction was, on the — day of —, dissolved by the superior court of chancery of Lynchburg, to which the cause had been removed by certiorari from the county court of Campbell which awarded the injunction; yet neither Calloway in his lifetime, nor Arthur at any time, ever paid Crenshaw, the amount of the judgment at law, and the costs and damages awarded him on the dissolution of the injunction, or any part thereof, but failed and refused to pay the same. Arthur put in the plea of conditions performed, on which an issue was made up.

At the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence a copy of the record of the suit in chancery, in which the injunction was awarded to Calloway, to stay proceedings on Crenshaw's judgment against him; from which it appeared, that the injunction in the condition of the bond mentioned, was awarded by the county court of Campbell, on the 9th August 1814, upon a bill exhibited by Calloway, alleging matters of equity against Anthony, the assignor of the bond to Crenshaw, on which the judgment at law had been recovered; that Anthony having put in an answer, in which the allegations of the bill were denied, the county court at July term 1820, dissolved the injunction, and, afterwards, at September term in the same year, on a hearing,

*The principal case is cited in Taylor v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Leigh 476. See monographic note on "Evidence" appended to Lee v. Tapscott, 2 Wash. 276.

dismissed the bill with costs: that afterwards, at November term in the same year, the county court on the motion of Calloway, "gave him leave to reinstate the injunction dismissed at September term." and to amend his bill: that amended bill was immediately exhibited, alleging other matters of equity against Anthony; and indeed, it was upon those new matters, first stated in the form of an affidavit, that the county court made the order giving Calloway leave to reinstate his injunction: that Anthony answered the amended bill; and many documents and depositions were filed; and then the cause remained, for some time, wholly neglected in the county court: that, at length, upon the application of 396 Anthony (who having "paid the amount of the debt to his assignee, was now entitled to the benefit of the judgment at law) the cause was removed by certiorari to the superiour court of chancery of Lynchburg; and that court, on motion, dissolved "the injunction awarded to Calloway by the county court of Campbell on the 9th August 1814." Whereupon, Arthur's counsel objected to the introduction of this record as evidence; but, the court overruled the objection and permitted the record to go in evidence to the jury; to which opinion he excepted.

There was a verdict and judgment for Crenshaw's administrator; from which Arthur appealed to the circuit court of Campbell, which affirmed the judgment; and then he appealed to this court.

Leigh, for the appellant, argued, that the injunction referred to in the condition of the bond, was the injunction awarded, by the county court of Campbell on the 9th August 1814; that that injunction was dissolved by the county court at July term 1820, and the bill on which it was awarded, was dismissed at September term following; so that the injunction referred to in the condition of the bond, was, in truth, dissolved by the county court of Campbell, and not by the superiour court of chancery of Lynchburg: that, therefore, as the declaration alleged, that the injunction had been dissolved by the superiour court of chancery, and the record adduced to prove the breach, shewed that it was dissolved by the county court, there was such a variance between the evidence adduced to prove the breach of the condition of the injunction bond, and the allegation of the breach in the declaration, as rendered the evidence inadmissible. It was true, the county court, at November term 1820, gave Calloway leave to reinstate the injunction before awarded to him, and dismissed at the preceding September term; but that, in fact, was an award of a new and distinct injunction, on new matter alleged, to which the injunction bond had not, and could not have, any relation. The county court could "not, at November term, reinstate the former injunction awarded on the original bill, which had been dismissed at September term. The injunction which remained to be disposed of, was the new injunction awarded at November term 1820; and the order of the superiour court of chancery, overlooking the injunction of November 1820, and dissolving the injunction of August 1814, which had already been dissolved, and the bill on which it was awarded dismissed, by the county court, was wholly nugatory.

Johnson, for the appellee, said, it was now quite immaterial, whether or no the county court could properly reinstate the original injunction, after the bill on which it was awarded had been dismissed at a previous term; for the county court, in fact, did reinstate, and intended to reinstate, the original injunction; and this at the instance of Calloway. But however that might be, there was no material variance between the record adduced to prove the breach, and the allegation of the breach, in the declaration. The declaration alleged, that the injunction referred to in the condition of the bond (namely, the injunction awarded by the county court on the 9th August 1814) was dissolved by the superiour court of chancery; and the record shewed an order of the superiour court, dissolving the injunction awarded by the county court on the 9th August 1814. The argument, that that injunction had been previously dissolved by the county court, was founded on a nice criticism: the record stated, exactly what the declaration alleged, that the injunction was dissolved by the superiour court. If the decree of the superiour court was wrong, it could not be thus impugned. Besides, the substantial part of the allegation was that the injunction had been dissolved; and it could not be material whether the plaintiff's history of the injunction cause was exactly accurate or not.

CARR, J. I have seen few cases that, in my apprehension, present less difficulty than this. The only question is, whether the record was admissible evidence.

398 The appellee "brings his action on an injunction bond, against the surety; and in his declaration describes the bond and sets out the condition with perfect accuracy, and, in assigning the breach of the condition, alleges that the injunction, which had been awarded by the county court of Campbell, was dissolved by the superiour court of chancery of Lynchburg. The defendant pleads conditions performed; and the issue is made up on that plea. The plaintiff to prove the breach laid in the declaration, offers in evidence the record of the injunction suit; and this record shews the whole proceedings in the county court, and the removal of the cause, by certiorari, to the superiour court; and states, in so many words, the decree of the superiour court, that the injunction awarded to Calloway by the said county court, on the 9th August 1814, be dissolved; which is the very injunction, on granting which the injunction bond, now sued on, was given. Could the court say that this evidence was not pertinent to the issue? not admissible under the pleadings? Unquestionably not. Here was the decree of a competent court dissolving the very injunction, the dissolution of which was the fact in issue. Whether that order of dissolution was a correct decree or not, was a question, surely, that could not be adjudged in this side way, on a question as to the admissibility of the record in evidence; the decree itself remaining in full force nowise impeached, and no appeal taken from it. I think the judgment must be affirmed.

CABELL, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. In Mowry v. Miller, 3 Leigh 561, which was an action for a malicious prosecution, the declaration set forth an examination and acquittal on the 7th October, and on the trial the plaintiff produced in evidence the record of an acquittal on the 7th November. The introduction of the record was objected to because of the variance. This court took a distinction between the case as it appeared, and that of a misrecital. We considered the 399 declaration as merely *alleging the fact of acquittal, and not as undertaking to recite the record; and (upon the authority of Purcell v. Macnamara, 9 East 157, overruling Pope v. Foster, 4 T. R. 590, and sustained by Philips v. Shaw, 4 Barn. & Ald. 435,) affirmed the judgment. These cases establish, that where the time of the trial of a particular fact is not material, a variance from the date, in alleging the trial and the result, will not be material, although it is to be proved by a record, provided the time be not alleged as descriptive of the record by means of a prout patet per recordum or otherwise. Although these cases are not ad idem with the case before us, the principle is, I think, altogether applicable. Here, the substance of the allegation in the declaration, is, that the injunction was dissolved. There is no attempt to recite the order of dissolution, nor is there any mention of its date. But instead of alleging, as was the fact, that the injunction was dissolved in the county court, it is erroneously stated, that it was dissolved by the superiour court of chancery:—I say erroneously, because, I do not think it necessary to go into the inquiry, how far the defendant Anthony was, on the one hand, bound to respect the order of the county court reinstating the injunction, or, on the other, how far he was at liberty to disregard it, because irregularly made. If he was bound to respect it; if it was in fact a restraint upon him, which he had no right to set at defiance, until it was removed by the same court or a superiour tribunal; and if, as I think, the reinstatement is to be considered as the old injunction, though most irregularly revived, then, the declaration strictly conforms to the fact. The injunction was dissolved by the superiour court of chancery of Lynchburg. But if Anthony was at liberty to disregard this irregular reinstatement, or if it is to be considered as a new order of injunction, it is certain that the declaration erroneously describes the court, at which the dissolution took place. This, however, was not the point of the allegation. The substance of it was the fact of dissolution, which was to entitle the plaintiff to his action, and the date of the dissolution to 400 ascertain *the extent of his demand.

It is not improbable, that the declaration would have been considered faulty on special demurrer in this latter respect, as the day of dissolution is blank. But that defect cannot affect the judgment now. The only point in question is, the mistake as to the court in which the injunction was dissolved, which I have already said I do not consider as forming a material part of the allegation.

The case of Busby v. Watson, 2 W. Black. 1050, is not inapplicable to shew, that the mistake of the court is as immaterial as the mistake of the date. There, in case for malicious prosecution, the declaration alleged that the defendant procured the plaintiff to be indicted at the general quarter sessions of the peace for Middlesex; and a record was introduced, proving indeed the fact of indictment, but that it was at the general sessions, instead of the general quarter sessions. These courts are different, for the general quarter sessions, have more extensive jurisdiction than the general sessions. The evidence was rejected at nisi prius for this variance; but the court of common pleas thought otherwise; and ordered a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

Daniels v. Conrad.*

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Contract to Transfer and Deliver Title Bond*—Acceptance of Order on Third Person to Deliver Bond—Effect.—Defendant agrees to assign, transfer and deliver a title bond to plaintiff; defendant gives an order on third persons requiring them to deliver the bond to plaintiff, and containing an assignment thereof to him; and this order is given by defendant, and accepted by plaintiff, in lieu of an actual delivery of the bond: HELD, the delivery of the order was tantamount to a delivery of the bond, and a full performance of the contract on defendant's part, whether plaintiff obtained the bond or not.

Same—Witnesses—Examination as to Value.—The agreement to transfer the title bond, was part of the consideration given by defendant for land bought of plaintiff: HELD, the value of this land is a proper subject of inquiry at the trial; and a witness, who had owned the land, having been examined by both parties as to its value, evidence offered to prove the price at which the witness had himself offered it for sale, is proper and competent.

Assumpsit for breach of contract, by Daniels against Conrad, in the circuit court of Pendleton.—There were two counts in the declaration.—The first alleged, that one Rogers contracted to sell to Conrad a parcel of land lying in the county of Nicholas, for 663 dollars, which sum Conrad paid to Rogers, and Rogers with one Skidmore his surety, thereupon, gave him a bond with condition that Rogers should within a specified time, make him a good title in fee simple, or refund the purchase money; and it being afterwards ascertained, that Rogers had no title to the land, and that it belonged of right to Daniels, Daniels sold the title, and caused it to be conveyed to Conrad, in consideration of 100 dollars paid him by Conrad, and of a promise and agreement on his part, to assign, transfer and deliver to Daniels, the title bond which had been executed by Rogers to Conrad, Rogers and his surety being at the time perfectly solvent and able to pay the amount which the bond bound them to refund; and the breach of Conrad's promise and agreement complained of, was, that he did not, and would not, assign, transfer and deliver, the title bond to Daniels, or cause it to be done.—The second count, after stating the contract between 402 Daniels and Conrad in the *same words as in the first count, stated the breach of Conrad's promise and agreement to assign the title bond, thus—that Conrad executed and delivered to Daniels an order (to which he put his seal) on O. Phelps and A. Earle, requesting them to deliver the title bond to Daniels, and thereby also assigning the title bond itself to Daniels; and this order was presented to Phelps and Earle, but neither of them did or would deliver the title bond to Daniels, and in fact neither of them had possession of the same; of which Conrad had notice, and was requested to deliver the title bond, or cause it to be delivered, to Daniels; and if the bond had been delivered to Daniels, he could have recovered the money due thereon from Rogers and his surety; but Conrad did not, and would not, deliver the title bond to Daniels, or cause it to be done. Conrad pleaded non assumpsit, and the statute of limitations. At the trial of the issues, the plaintiff filed two bills of exceptions to opinions of the court.

1. From the first of them, it appeared that it was proved, that the land sold by Daniels to Conrad, had originally belonged to the father of Daniels, who in truth had made the arrangement with Conrad for the sale of it to him, but before the bargain was executed, had given and transferred the benefit thereof (as an advancement) to his son the plaintiff, between whom and Conrad the bargain was finally completed; and the father having been introduced by the plaintiff as a witness on his behalf, to prove the circumstances and manner of the transaction, was examined, both by the plaintiff's and the defendant's counsel, as to the real value of the land which was the subject of the contract, at the time of the sale to Conrad; and in the cross examination, he was asked by the defendant's counsel, whether he had not, before the sale of the land to the defendant, offered to sell it to one Crouch for less than 400 dollars? to which he answered, that he had not as well as he remembered, but that if he had, it was for very little less than 400 dollars. Afterwards, in the progress of the trial, the defendant's counsel called Crouch 403 as a witness, and asked him, whether *the first witness (the plaintiff's father) had not offered to sell the land to him before the sale made to Conrad, and if so, at what price? The plaintiff's counsel objected to the inquiry, that it related to collateral matter, which had been brought into the cause by the defendant's counsel himself in his cross examination of the first witness, and that it was not competent to the defendant to controvert it. But the court, thinking that the answer to the inquiry might be proper testimony to be weighed by the jury, in estimating the degree of credit that ought to be given to the testimony of the first witness, overruled the objection, and directed the witness Crouch to answer the question; to which opinion the plaintiff's counsel excepted.

2. It appeared, that upon the contract between Daniels and Conrad being concluded, Conrad gave Daniels an order on Phelps and Earle for the title bond, dated March 6, 1820, and signed and sealed by Conrad in these words—"To O. Phelps and A. Earle—You will please deliver to J. Daniels [the plaintiff] the title bond I hold of C. Rogers and A. Skidmore, for I hereby assign the same to Daniels for value received (N. B. without recourse)." On this order there was this indorsement—"There is no such bond in my hands; (signed) A. Earle." And the court, on the motion of the defendant's counsel, instructed the jury, that if they should find from the testimony, that the above order was executed and delivered by Conrad to Daniels, and accepted by Daniels, in place of the actual delivery into his hands of the title bond therein mentioned, they must find a verdict for the defendant; to which opinion of the court the plaintiff's counsel excepted.

There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant; from which the plaintiff appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant, argued, 1st, That the whole inquiry as to the value of the land, and much more the special inquiry propounded by the defendant's counsel on his cross examination of the plain- 404 tiff's witness, were collateral to the issue: that it was obvious, the inquiry as to the value of the land could only have been gone into, to ascertain the measure of damages; but, in that view, the value of the title bond which Conrad undertook to assign to Daniels for the land, not the estimated value of the land, was the point in issue: that the inquiry propounded to the witness, as to the price for which he had offered to sell the land, was collateral again to the inquiry as to the value of the land, which was itself collateral to the issue; and the question was only intended to lay a foundation for impeaching the credit of the witness. Now, he said, it was a settled rule, that a witness is not to be cross examined as to a distinct collateral fact, for the purpose of afterwards impeaching his credit; and if a witness answers such a question, evidence cannot afterwards be admitted to contradict his testimony on such collateral matter. Stark. Law Ev. part 2, § 22, vol. 1, p. 134. 1 Phil. Law Ev. ch. 8, p. [227.]† 2ndly, He said the instruction given by the court to the jury was erroneous. Here was no demurrer to the evidence, and no statement of the evidence, from which the whole case could be ascertained. The court directed the jury, that if they should find a single fact, namely, that Conrad's order on Phelps and Earle for the title bond, had been given by him, and accepted by Daniels, in place of the actual delivery of the bond,—they must find for the defendant. To justify such an instruction, it must appear from the pleadings, that that fact was conclusive of the point in issue; but there was no issue made up on the point. For aught that appeared, it might have been in proof, that Conrad when he gave the order on Phelps and Earle, knew that neither had possession of it; nay, that he had it in his own possession; that he had afterwards assigned it away, and delivered it to another person: in such case, it could hardly be contended, that his fraudulent imposition of a nugatory order for the bond on Daniels, in place of the actual delivery thereof to *him, would exempt him from the duty to assign, transfer and deliver the bond.

Daniel, for the appellee, said, the conduct of both parties at the trial, shewed that the value of the land was material to the issue; for the plaintiff and defendant both, had gone into that inquiry: and then the defendant asked a question, the object of which was to ascertain at what price the land had been offered for sale; an inquiry of all others, the best calculated to ascertain its real value; so that if a false answer was given by the witness to this question, it was strictly proper to offer evidence to contradict him, and thus to impeach his credit. As to the other point, he said, the precise point in issue was, whether Conrad had, according to his promise, assigned, transferred and delivered the title bond to Daniels. The order drawn by Conrad on Phelps and Earle, was an absolute deed of assignment of the title bond to Daniels; and the instruction was no more than this, that the delivery and acceptance of the order for the bond, was tantamount to the actual delivery of the bond itself, if both parties agreed and intended that it should be so. Daniels, it appeared, presented the order to Earle, who said he had no such bond in his possession; but it did not appear that he ever applied to Phelps, or that if application had been made to him, the order would have been ineffectual to procure the bond.

TUCKER, P. Without impugning the principles laid down by Starkie and Philips, in the passages cited by the appellants' counsel, I am of opinion, that there was no error in the admission of the testimony set forth in the first bill of exceptions. The value of the land was certainly material to the issue. The evidence of the witness as to the value, was, of course, directly applicable to the issue, and every fact going to disprove his valuation was, in like manner, material or applicable. For what goes to disprove evidence that is directly applicable, must be itself directly applicable. It cannot be deemed collateral only. Thus, it cannot be 406 *denied, that if, in detinue, a witness swears that the value of a horse is 100 dollars, evidence would be admissible to prove that he had sworn, upon a formal trial, that he was worth only 50 dollars. And if such evidence as this would be within the issue, and not collateral but direct, evidence of his declarations not on oath, though less strong, would certainly not be less direct. In like manner, though evidence that he had offered the same horse for the price of 50 dollars, might not be as strong as the evidence of his declarations, because he might be asking a lower price than he really thought the property worth, yet certainly it cannot be fairly affirmed to be less direct. I think, therefore it was proper to permit evidence to contradict the testimony of the witness as to the price at which he had offered the land.

The question presented by the second bill of exceptions is more difficult. The first count in the declaration goes distinctly enough for the failure to deliver the bond according to contract. Now, I think, there can be no question, that as to this count, the evidence was conclusive against the plaintiff. For, certainly, if the defendant did draw and deliver the order to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff did accept the same in the place of actual delivery into his hands, of the title bond itself, it was a sufficient fulfilment of the contract to deliver, and a discharge of the defendant in this action. The original contract to deliver was satisfied and at an end, whatever other rights might have become vested in the plaintiff by the act done in satisfaction.

What then was the effect of that act? what rights did it confer on the plaintiff?

1. By the delivery of the order, and its acceptance in the place of the actual delivery of the bond, the title to the bond absolutely passed. Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473. If it had been afterwards burnt, lost or destroyed, the loss would have been Daniels's, not Conrad's. 2. By that delivery and passing of title, the property in the bond itself so passed, that if Phelps or Earle had it in their possession, trover or detinue would have lain for it, whether they accepted the order or not. And if

407 they *had it not, those actions might have been sustained by the plaintiff against any person in whose possession it might happen to be, even the defendant himself. And if it was found not to be in Phelps's or Earle's hands, whose concern was it to search for it, after the plaintiff had received the order as an actual delivery into his hands of the bond itself? It was, surely, the plaintiff's concern. The defendant was not only not bound to search or sue for it, as he had discharged himself from all further connexion with it, but he had no right to sue for it. He could neither have brought trover nor detinue, nor even a bill of discovery against Phelps or Earle, or any other person. The delivery had passed away the property, and left him powerless over the subject. 3. The right of property in the subject, would have enabled Daniels to sue the obligors at law or in equity on the lost bond, and establish it by the evidence of the defendant himself. Or he might have sued Phelps and Earle, and called upon the defendant to prove their possession; or he might have brought them all into equity, on the ground that the money was due to him, and demanded, that the obligors should pay it to him accordingly; that Phelps and Earle should give it up, or account for it; or that the defendant, should surrender it if he had it, or pay him the amount of it, if there had been in fact no such bond as he represented. And 4. In like manner, he might at law have sued the defendant in detinue or trover, if the defendant had the bond, or he might sue him in an action for deceit, or even in assumpsit, if he had pretended to sell him a bond, which had no existence. These remedies are still open to him if he is injured. But I do not think he could sue him in assumpsit, after receiving this order as a full compliance with the contract to deliver the bond; and therefore the proof of that fact was a complete bar of his action.

I am therefore of opinion, that there is no error in the judgment.

The other judges concurred. Judgment affirmed.

408 *Melson v. Doe on Demise of Cooper.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Wills—Devise of Land with Absolute Power to Sell—Limitation Over—Effect.—Testator devises land to his son William and his heirs, and if he should die without a son and not sell the land, then to testator's son George: HOLD, the devise gave William absolute power to sell the fee simple; and therefore, whether he sold it or not, he took a fee simple, and the devise over to George was void.

Upon the trial of an ejectment, brought by George Cooper against Edmund Melson, in the circuit court of Elizabeth City, for a message and parcel of land in that county, the jury found a special verdict, from which it appeared that the case was thus:

John Cooper died in 1813, seized of the message and land in controversy, having by his last will duly made and published, devised, inter alia, as follows—"I give to my son William Cooper the plantation I live on, to him and his heirs forever. In case he should die without a son and not sell the land, I give the land to my son George; and if he should die under age, then the land to be sold by John Herbert, and divide the money among all my children then alive or their children that may be alive at that time." The plantation on which the testator lived, was the land now in controversy. George Cooper, the lessor of the plaintiff, was the testator's son George, mentioned in the devise, who claimed the land under the limitation over to him therein contained. The testator's son William, to whom the land was devised in the first instance, attained to full age, married, and died leaving issue one daughter, but without leaving or ever having had a son, and without having sold the land. Melson, the defendant, claimed under William Cooper. The question referred to the court, was, Whether, upon this state of facts, George Cooper, the lessor of the plaintiff, was entitled to the land?

The circuit court held that he was, and gave him judgment accordingly; from which Melson appealed to this court.

409 *Johnson, for the appellant, insisted, 1. that, even throwing out of view the unlimited right clearly given to William the first taker, to sell the land, the devise to him and his heirs, and if he should die without a son, then over, would have given him an estate tail, which the statute for abolishing entails would have converted into a fee simple, and barred the contingent remainder to George: he cited Robinson v. Robinson, 1 Burr. 38, 3 Bro. P. C. (Tomlin's ed.) 180, S. C. and Robinson v. Miller, 1 Rolls's Abr. 837, pl. 12. But 2. he said, here was a manifest intent to give William, the first taker, an unlimited and absolute right to sell the land, when, how, and to whom he pleased; he might have sold the fee simple; and, therefore, he took the fee simple by the devise, and though he did not sell, he died seized of the fee simple. Upon this point, he cited Riddick v. Cohoon, 4 Rand. 547.

Leigh, for the appellee, admitted that the case of Riddick v. Cohoon was in point and conclusive, unless a distinction could be made between a bequest of personal property with a general power to sell it at pleasure, which was the case there, and a devise of real estate, with a general power to the devisee to sell it, which was the present case; and he confessed he could see no ground on which he could maintain such a distinction.

CARR and CABELL, J., founding their judgment on the last point (as the reporter understood) that a general absolute unlimited power to sell the land, was plainly given to William Cooper by the devise, held, that he took a fee simple, and therefore that the judgment was erroneous.

TUCKER, P., doubted on both points, and, upon the whole, inclined to the opinion, that the judgment of the circuit court was right.

Judgment reversed, and judgment entered for the appellant.

interest the intestate's widow is entitled to in the proceeds of the slaves so sold: HELD, that, as the widow was entitled to only a life interest in one-third of the slaves, the best general practical rule is, to give her one-third of the proceeds of sale thereof for her life, requiring bond with surety of her, that the principal, at her death, shall be paid to the persons entitled in remainder.

This was an appeal from a decree of the superiour court of chancery of Williamsburg, in a suit between J. A. Chandler administrator of Joseph Godwin deceased, who had been administrator of Edmond Godwin deceased, and Martha Godwin widow of Edmond, and administratrix de bonis non of his estate, and others his distributees; which involved a settlement of Joseph Godwin's accounts of administration of the estate of Edmond Godwin, and a distribution of any balance found due thereon.

Upon the settlement of the accounts before the commissioner, it appeared, that there was a balance due from the estate of

Joseph Godwin to that of Edmond Godwin; but this balance consisted intirely of the proceeds of slave property of Edmond's estate, which had been sold by Joseph, under an apprehension that the sale was necessary to raise funds to pay debts of Edmond's estate, though it turned out that the sale was not necessary, or that more slaves were sold than necessary, to meet the debts. And in distributing this balance, the commissioner allowed the widow one-third of it in absolute property. To this an exception was taken, on the ground, that as the widow was entitled by law only to a life estate in one-third of the slave property of her husband, so she was only entitled to the value of a life interest in one-third of the proceeds of the slaves 411 that had *been sold. The chancellor, in his decree, overruled the exception, approved the report, and decreed accordingly.

An appeal was taken by Chandler, from the decree generally; and there were many questions arising on the details of the accounts; but the only question of law was that presented by the above mentioned exception to the commissioner's report.

necessary to pay debts. It turned out otherwise, and the question was, what interest the widow took in the proceeds. If the slaves had not been sold, she would have been entitled by statute to one-third of them for life. TUCKER, Judge, in delivering the opinion of the court held, that she took a life-estate in one third of the purchase-money. He uses this language: 'The use of the purchase money for life is therefore the most proper measure; and whenever her portion of purchase money is so paid over to a widow for life, bond with security should be required of her for paying it over at her death to the persons entitled in remainder.' JUDGE TUCKER cites no authority in support of his position, that the widow should be required to give security, draws no distinction between a life-tenant of money and other personal chattels, so as to take the case out of the general rule, gives no reason why security should be required, and does not discuss the question at all.

'There is this difference between the cases I have referred to and Godwin v. Godwin. In all of those cases the life-tenant took under the provisions of a will; in that case the life-tenant took by force of the law. Whatever importance may be attributed to that difference, and I must confess I can see no difference in principle, upon the ground that in the case of a will the testator had it in his power to require security, and his failure to do it was evidence of a personal trust and confidence, and in the case of a life-tenant by force of the law there is no personal trust and confidence. It does not affect the question I am considering. If the effect of JUDGE TUCKER's decision in Godwin v. Godwin is to hold that a life-tenant of money or other personal chattel is not entitled to the possession of such money or other chattel until bond with security is given for the return of the money or property upon the termination of the life-estate, then I am compelled to dissent from such decision, as contrary both to principle and authority.

'I know of no case where it has been held, that a life-tenant can be required to give security for the return of the property, unless some special reasons are assigned, as in Chisholm v. Starke, 3 Call 25, and Frazier v. Bevell, 11 Gratt. 2. On the contrary, in Holliday v. Coleman, 2 Munf. 162, and Mortimer v. Moffatt, 4 Hen. & M. 508, the court refused to require security, saying in the latter case: 'Yet the court will not rule the tenant for life to give security to have the property forthcoming at his death, unless there appear some danger of its being wasted or put out of the way.'

'There is no difference between money and any other personal chattel. Weeks v. Weeks, 5 N. H. 326; Scott v. Price, 2 Serg. & R. 59; Dunbar v. Woodcock, 10 Leigh 628. The fact, that in Godwin v. Godwin, money was to be paid to the widow instead of other personal property could not have been the ground of the decision of JUDGE TUCKER. In that case the widow was entitled to the slaves. They were converted into money without her assent and under a misapprehension upon the part of the administrator; she should not have been placed in a worse position with regard to the proceeds, than she was with regard to the thing sold.'

See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

TUCKER, P. The court is of opinion, that the widow is improperly allowed one-third of the balance found due from the administrator, in absolute property. That balance is, in effect, the proceeds of the sales of slaves, to one-third of which she had title indeed, but only for life. What her proportion of the price ought to be, can be estimated by no certain rule that the court knows of. It is a complicated question presenting a triple ratio; the probable life of the widow, the probable life of the slaves, and the difference between the hires of the slaves in her portion, and the interest of her portion of their price. For, if the slaves had not been sold, their hires would have been of more value to her than the interest of the money; and, therefore, the mere interest of the money for life would seem, at first view, not a fair compensation; yet as this is certain, and the hires uncertain, since the slaves may die, perhaps there is no better rule, in such cases, than to allow her one-third of the money for life. No other course can approximate to what is right. For it is possible the slaves, or the widow, may die, the day after allotment; and so her interest may be worth little or nothing. But it is also possible, that the slaves may live many years, and yet die before her, and then she would have had the whole value. And it is also possible, she might live until they were superannuated; so that if they survived her, they would be a charge and not a profit. The use of the 412 *purchase money for life, is, therefore, the most proper measure; and wherever her portion of purchase money is so paid over to a widow for life, bond with security should be required of her, for paying it over at her death, to the persons entitled in remainder.

Decree reversed, and cause remanded.

Bargamin v. Poitiaux Ex'or &c.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Replevin—Avowry—Nonappearance of Plaintiff—Non-Suit.—In replevin, defendant makes avowry for rent due him from plaintiff, and then plaintiff failing to appear and plead, is non-suit: Held,

Same—Same—Same—Writ of Enquiry—Statute.—It is proper, in such case, to award a writ of inquiry to ascertain avowant's damages, under the 23rd section of the general statute of rents. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 118.

Same—Same—Insufficient—Effect.—In such case, too, the avowry is to be considered as only a suggestion, and though it be faulty as an avowry, in not shewing the landlord's title, yet as a suggestion, it is good and sufficient.

Same—Same—Same—Jeoffails.—In such case, moreover, the statute of jeoffails would be applicable to cure all defects in the avowry.

Judgment by Default—When Statute of Jeoffails Applicable.—In general, the statute of jeoffails is not applicable in case of a judgment by default for want of appearance; but if the party has once appeared, though he makes default afterwards, and then there is judgment against him by such default, the statute of jeoffails is applicable.

Poitiaux executor of Wercq having distrained the goods of Bargamin, for 120 dollars rent claimed of him, Bargamin, sued out of the circuit court of Henrico, a writ of replevin of the goods, and gave bond with surety to perform the judgment of the court in case he should be cast, according to the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113, § 23, p. 451. The declaration was in the usual form, alleging the unjust taking and detention of the goods against sureties and pledges.

The suit was commenced as long ago as January 1820. But from October 1820, 413 when the cause was, by order of *the court, transferred from the rules to the court docket, until March term 1826, it seemed to have been neglected by both parties, and was only continued by force of the provisions of the statute to prevent discontinuances. At March term 1826, Poitiaux filed his avowry, in these words:

"And the said Poitiaux executor of L. Wercq deceased, by H. C. his attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when &c. and well avows the taking of the goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned in the said dwelling house in which &c. and justly &c. because he says, that he the said Poitiaux executor as aforesaid, for a long time to wit, for all the time during which the rent hereinafter mentioned was accruing due, and from thence until and at the said time when &c. was landlord to the said Bargamin of the said dwelling house in which &c. and the said Bargamin for a long time, to wit, for the space of two quarters of a year ending on &c. and from thence until and at the same time when &c. held and enjoyed the said dwelling house in which &c. with the appurtenances as tenant thereof to the said Poitiaux executor as aforesaid, under a certain demise thereof theretofore made, at and under a certain yearly rent, to wit, the yearly rent of 400 dollars, payable quarterly, on the first days of January, April, July and October, in every year, by even and equal portions; and because the sum of 120 dollars of the rent aforesaid for two quarters ending on the said 1st day of January 1820, and from thence until and at the same time when &c. was due and in arrear from the said A. Bargamin to the said Poitiaux executor as aforesaid, he well avows the taking of the said goods and chattels in the said dwelling house in which &c. and justly &c. as for and in the name of a distress for the said rent so due and in arrear to the said Poitiaux executor as aforesaid, in manner aforesaid, and which still remains due and unpaid. And this he is ready to verify &c. Wherefore, he prays judgment, and a return of the said goods and chattels, together with his damages &c. according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, to be adjudged to him &c."

414 To this avowry no plea was put in. And, at a subsequent term, the avowant appearing by his attorney, and the plaintiff being called and not appearing, on the motion of the avowant, it was adjudged, that the plaintiff be nonsuited, and that the avowant go thereof without day; and on the further motion of the avowant, it was ordered, that a jury should inquire how much of the rent in the avowry mentioned was in arrear and unpaid at the time of the taking of the goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned: whereupon a jury was impaneled to make the inquiry, who found, that there was at the time of the distress made, 120 dollars of the rent in the avowry mentioned in arrear and unpaid: therefore, with the assent of the avowant, it was adjudged by the court, that the avowant should recover against the plaintiff, the sum of 120 dollars with interest after the rate of six per centum per annum from the 1st January 1820 till payment and his costs &c. and that the said avowant have execution thereof &c.

*In order to understand the disputed points of practice in this case, it is proper to mention, that none of the english statutes on the subject were in force in Virginia at the time this action was commenced. The statute of 7 Hen. 8. ch. 4. and 21 Hen. 8. ch. 19. providing that the avowant, in replevin, for rent, if the plaintiff be barred, shall recover damages and costs, had been repealed; and neither the statute of 17 Car. 2. ch. 7. directing the proceedings and judgment in replevin, in case the plaintiff be nonsuit, or judgment be given for the avowant on demurrer, nor the statute of 11 Geo. 2. ch. 19. simplifying the form of the avowry or consurance in replevin, were ever in force in Virginia: nor had we any similar statutory provisions. The only statute, varying the proceedings and judgments in replevin, from the course of the common law, was the provision in the statute of rents, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 118, § 23, p. 451, requiring bond and surety of the plaintiff, before suing out the writ, to perform and satisfy the judgment of the court. In case he shall be cast: it is provided, that "if upon the trial of the suit, it shall be found that the rent distrained for was justly due, the party injured or delayed by suing forth the writ, shall recover, against the party suing forth and prosecuting the same, double the value of the rent in arrear and distrained for, with full costs of suit." But after this suit was brought, namely in February 1823, a statute was enacted, whereby it was provided, that in all cases where property distrained or attached for rent, shall be claimed by any other person or persons than the tenant or tenants, it shall be lawful for the said person or persons to sue out his or their writ of replevin, directed to the sheriff: and upon the execution of a bond by the person or persons suing out the writ, with one or more sufficient securities, in double the amount of the value of the said property, to be ascertained by two disinterested freeholders, to be sworn before some justice of the peace, and conditioned to perform and sat-

Judgments.—See monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425.

415 *Upon the petition of Bargamin to this court, a supersedeas to the judgment was allowed him.

Leigh, for the plaintiff in error, said the avowry was clearly naught; that it was framed upon the precedent in 2 Chit. Plead. 512, of an avowry under the statute of 11 Geo. 2, ch. 19, § 22, but there was no similar provision in the statute law of Virginia, and the avowry must be judged of by the common law rules of pleading; Southall v. Garner, 2 Leigh 372. He took the question to be, whether the defects of the avowry were cured by the statute of jeofails, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 103, p. 512, which after very strong provisions for curing defects after verdict (provisions which, he admitted, would cure the defects of the avowry here, if they were applicable to the case) provided, that "neither shall any judgment, entered by nil dicit or non sum informatus be reversed, nor a judgment after inquiry of damages be stayed or reversed, for any omission or fault, which would not have been a good cause to stay or reverse the judgment if there had 416 been a verdict." Now, "a judgment by nil dicit was, where a party appears, but does not plead; and a judgment by non sum informatus was, where a party appears by his attorney, but the attorney says he is not informed of any answer; but here the plaintiff in replevin, after filing his declaration, and after avowry by the defendant, made default and was nonsuit. It had often been decided by this court, that the statute of jeofails did not apply to cases of judgment by default; and in Roe v. Baker, in which the defendant appeared and obtained two continuances, without putting in a plea, and the cause was tried between the parties, both appearing, as if there had been a plea, and verdict and judgment rendered for the plaintiff, the court held, that this was a judgment by default, and that, therefore, the statute of jeofails had no application to the case, and reversed the judgment for defects in the declaration.† And as to the circumstance of the judgment isfy the judgment of the court in such suit, in case he or they shall be cast therein, such sheriff shall proceed to execute and return such writ, as heretofore; and the jury that shall try the issue in such cause, shall also inquire of the value of the property, and of the damages sustained by the avowant, by occasion of the suing out the said writ, which in no case shall be less than the value of ten per centum upon such value; and judgment shall be accordingly rendered, if the plaintiff be barred, for the value so ascertained, with interest from the date of the writ, and the damages and costs. And if the plaintiff be nonsuit before issue joined, the court, upon the suggestion of the defendant, in the nature of an avowry, shall award a writ to inquire of the value and damages as aforesaid, which shall be ascertained by the jury, and judgment shall be given accordingly."—"And that so much of the twenty-fourth section of the aforesaid act, to which this is an amendment, as subjects the party suing out the writ of replevin to the penalty of double the value of the rent in arrear, and distrained for, if he shall be cast in the suit, shall be, and the same is hereby repealed." Sess. Acts of 1822-3, ch. 29; Supp. to Rev. Code, ch. 193, § 4, 5, pp. 254, 5.—Note in Original Edition.

Roe v. Baker*, was argued by Stanard for the plaintiff in error, and by Leigh for the defendant, and decided in December 1826—it has never been reported. It was a suit brought by Baker against Roe upon an award. The declaration was, in many respects, fatally defective and faulty: this was admitted on all hands, and indeed was too apparent to be denied; and the only question was, whether the defects were cured by the statute of in the present case being a judgment after inquiry of damages, he said, the directing that inquiry was itself a palpable error. The english statutes, respecting the course of proceeding and the judgment in case the plaintiff in replevin be nonsuit, not being in force here, and there being no similar statutory provisions of our own in 417 existence *when this suit was brought, the proceedings and judgment should have been according to the course of the common law; and according to the common law, the only judgment that could have been given, was a judgment awarding a return of the goods distrained to the defendant, to be irreplevisable in future. 1 Esp. Ni. Pri. 376; 6 Bac. Abr. Replevin and Avowry, L. pp. 83, 4; 1 Wms. Saund. 195a, note 3; 2 Id. 286, note 5. The avowry in this case, therefore, very properly, only demanded judgment for a return of the goods to the avowant. It was very obvious, that the proceedings after the nonsuit of the plaintiff, the award of the writ of inquiry, and the judgment of the court, were moulded upon the statute of February 1823; but that statute could give no warrant for such proceedings, because, 1. the statute was enacted after this suit was commenced; and 2. the statute applies only to actions of replevin brought by a person other than the tenant, to recover his own goods improperly distrained for rent due from the tenant.

Scott, for the defendant in error, argued, that the statute of February 1823, though it was enacted after the action was brought, was properly resorted to by the court, as a rule for its proceedings, and well warranted the writ of inquiry and the judgment, both of which were subsequent to the enactment; and if not, yet, that the statute of jeofails was applicable to the case, and cured all defects in the avowry.

TUCKER, P. At common law, in the action of replevin, after issue joined, both parties are plaintiffs, and therefore the plaintiff cannot suffer a nonsuit. Eggleton v. Smart, 1 W. Blacks. 375; Jones v. Concanon, 3 T. R. 661; Hodgkinson v. Snibson, 3 Bos. & Pull. 603. But, before issue joined, he is the only plaintiff; and he might therefore have suffered a nonsuit, and terminated the whole process. But when he did so, the judgment was not merely that he take nothing by his bill, as in other cases of nonsuit: for having, by his replevin, got what he principally wanted, that is, his goods, and then abandoned the process instituted to es-jeofails? The defendant had appeared at one term, moved for, and obtained a continuance; appeared again at the next term, and obtained another continuance; and then at the third term, both parties appeared and went to trial, exactly as if the defendant had pleaded, and an issue had been regularly made up, though, in fact, he had never put in any plea; and there was a verdict for the plaintiff, on which the court gave him judgment. This court held that this was not a judgment by nil dicit, or non sum informatus, or an inquiry of damages, but a judgment by default, to which the statute of jeofails was not applicable, and, therefore, reversed the judgment for the defects of the declaration: dissentient GREEN, J. who (as the reporter well remembers) held, that the statute of jeofails was applicable in cases of judgments by default; a proposition which the counsel for the defendant in error had earnestly endeavoured to maintain.—Note in Original Edition.

418 tablish *his right to them, it was right he should be compelled to return them. Hence, the judgment, in case of nonsuit in replevin, went on to award that the defendant should have a return of the goods and chattels; Tidd's Pract. Forms, p. 599. And this was equally the case whether the nonsuit was before or after avowry, as where it was for want of a declaration; Id. 586. If then the case at bar stood unaffected by any statute, the court ought to have given a mere judgment for a return of the goods, when the plaintiff suffered a nonsuit; and whether there was a good or bad avowry filed, or whether an avowry was filed or not, the judgment must have been the same.

In England, however, the common law has been modified by several statutes. Those passed in the reign of Henry 8, gave to the avowant damages for the vexatious replevin, either in case of judgment against the plaintiff upon demurrer on a nonsuit, or in case the jury found for the avowant; in which last case, the same jury might assess the damages; but if they failed to do so, a writ of inquiry might be awarded; and, in the first two cases, the avowant was always entitled to his writ of inquiry. 1 Wms. Saund. 195, c. in note. An extract from the statutes is to be found in the same note. They are, I presume, not in force at this time in Virginia. Next came the statute 17 Car. 2, the provisions of which may be found in the same note. But this statute never was in force with us, nor was the statute 11 Geo. 2, ch. 19, § 22, dispensing with the necessity of regularly setting out in the avowry the title of the lessor or landlord; 2 Id. 284, c. But though the statute of 17 Car. 2, was never in force, yet, we have long had a provision in our statute book making a great innovation in the common law: it will be found in the statute of 1769, ch. 4, 8 Hen. Stat. at Large 382, 3, and in the Old Rev. Code, Pleasants's edi. ch. 89, § 15, and 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113, § 23, p. 451, and it was the law of the land at the time of the commencement of this suit. By this statute it is provided, that "if upon the trial of the suit, it be found that the rent distrained for was 419 justly due, the *party injured or delayed by suing for the writ of replevin, shall recover against the party suing forth and prosecuting the same, double the value of the rent distrained for, and full costs." Yet, though this statute devolves upon the landlord a right to double rent, it makes no particular provisions for the mode in which the party is to proceed. It leaves the courts to mould the remedy to the right, or, what is much better, to follow the established course of proceeding in analogous cases at common law, or cases under analogous english statutes. It is to be wished, I think, that this court had pursued the latter course in Maxwell v. Light, 1 Call 117, instead of the practice established in that case, which seems to me both anomalous and inconvenient. Be this as it may, that case respected a trial where an issue had been made up between the parties: our concern is with the case of a nonsuit after avowry.

That the right of the landlord to a judgment for double rent, was confined to the case of an issue made-up and trial thereof between the parties, and did not extend to a judgment in case of nonsuit or upon demurrer, does not seem to be a reasonable construction. The double damages were given as a satisfaction for the delay and injury of suing forth the writ, and the wrong is enhanced where the proceeding has been so frivolous, that the plaintiff himself has abandoned his pretensions. Upon nonsuit, therefore, or upon demurrer, I think the avowant is entitled to double rent if it shall appear that the rent distrained for was justly due. But how is that fact to be ascertained? I answer by a writ of inquiry. And how is the inquiry to be presented to the jury, where the plaintiff has suffered a nonsuit before the pleadings are made up? I answer, by filing a suggestion in the nature of an avowry. Now, this is precisely the course which was pursued under the statutes of Hen. 8. Those statutes gave the landlord a right to damages, but they said not a word as to the mode in which the party was to get at them. The courts therefore decided, that these damages were to be ascertained by writ of inquiry;

420 1 Wms. Saund. *195, c. in note; 6 Bac. Abr. Replevin and Avowry, L. pp. 84, 6; 14 Petersd. Abr. 280. Lord Hardwicke seems, indeed, to have laid down a very broad and proper principle, that in every case where it may be necessary for the purpose of doing complete justice, a writ of inquiry may be granted; with the exception of the case of a jury failing to inquire of the rent in arrear under the statute of Charles, which in strong language, seems to tie up the inquiry to the jury impaneled to try the issue. But the courts also decided, under the same statutes, although they contain not a syllable about a suggestion, that if the landlord would, in the case of nonsuit, entitle himself to damages within the statutes, he must make a cognizance or avowry, or a suggestion pro retorno habendo; 1 Wms. Saund. 195, e.

From these analogies, I am of opinion, that where the landlord chooses to avail himself of the statute, he must in case of nonsuit before issue joined, file a suggestion in the nature of an avowry, and thereupon a writ of inquiry must be awarded to inquire of the value of the rent in arrear. He may, however, waive the statute, and take the common law judgment de retorno habendo, since the statute only adds to his remedy. 1 Wms. Saund. 195, c; Rees v. Morgan, 3 T. R. 349.

In this case, the parties have been supposed to have proceeded under the statute of February 1823. That statute cannot apply to an action brought before its commencement. For though, at first view, it may seem to affect the remedy only, it in fact most materially acts upon the rights of the parties. When the lessee brought this suit, the landlord under the statute then existing, immediately became entitled to recover double rent, if the distress was found rightful. The statute of 1823 takes away the double rent, and gives in lieu of it, damages not less than ten per cent. It goes then to the right, and not merely to the remedy, and is obviously not binding upon the rights of the landlord. But if not in force as to the landlord, it cannot be in force as to the tenant. If it is law for one, it is law for the other.

421 I consider *it therefore as not applying to this case. But I am not satisfied, that the proceeding is not perfectly reconcilable with the previous statute. By it, a writ of inquiry is rendered necessary for ascertaining whether the rent distrained for was justly due and in arrear. Now, that is the inquiry directed here, in effect; and the jury have found 120 dollars of rent in arrear, which is the amount avowed for. Upon this verdict, the landlord might have demanded judgment for double rent; but by his consent, judgment was entered for the rent in arrear with interest at six per centum only: thus waiving the heavy penalty which the law entitled him to insist on.

It is contended, however, that the avowry is bad, according to the decision of Southall v. Garner, 2 Leigh 372, in which it is declared that as the statute of 11 Geo. 2, ch. 19, § 22, is not in force in Virginia, the old common law strictness, as to setting forth the avowant's title in the avowry, must be adhered to. Admitting this doctrine in its fullest extent, in its application to an avowry upon which an issue in fact or in law is made up, I do not think it can apply to a mere suggestion after a nonsuit, of which character the avowry in this case must be considered, as the plaintiff neither demurred nor pleaded to it. Where the parties go to issue upon the right of distress, there is more reason to demand that the title out of which the right grows, should be distinctly stated. But, in the case of a nonsuit, the plaintiff waives the contest, and acknowledges the right; and the writ of inquiry is only to ascertain the quantum of the demand. This is the general character of a writ of inquiry. See the cases collected 10 Peterad. Abr. 654, & seq. The suggestion, therefore, in this case, would seem sufficient. Why insert the title in detail, when the tenant cannot contest or traverse it in this stage of the proceeding. The landlord, indeed, must prove the lease, and the rent due; and the tenant is at liberty to controvert its being in arrear, by proving payments; but I apprehend he can no more plead in this case to the sug-

422 gestion, than he could plead to *the suggestion of breaches after a judgment by default in debt on bond with collateral condition. See Bullythorpe v. Turner, Willes 435; Foot's case, 1 Salk. 93; 14 Peterad. 268, in note; 1 Wms. Saund. 58, note 1. Upon looking into the forms of these suggestions, I incline to think, they were much more general than avowries, even before the statute of 11 Geo. 2, ch. 19. See Tidd's Pract. Forms 586, which I take to be under the statute of Charles 2, and not of George 2. That is quite general.

Upon the whole, I am therefore for affirming the judgment, without thinking it necessary to resort to the statute of jeofails to sustain the avowry or suggestion.

CABELL, J. The statute of jeofails declares, that no judgment entered by nil dicit, or non sum informatus, shall be reversed, nor shall a judgment after inquiry of damages be stayed or reversed, for any omission or fault which would not have been a good cause to stay or reverse the judgment, if there had been a verdict. I have never considered this statute as embracing any case of judgments by default for want of appearance; whether those judgments be final, as in case of office judgments confirmed in actions on bonds, bills or notes; or merely interlocutory, and afterwards completed by writ of inquiry of damages, as in actions on the case. That it does not extend to the former class of cases, is manifest from Nadenbush v. Lane, 4 Rand. 413. If this were not so, the plaintiff might bring his action on a bond for 100 dollars, which the defendant, knowing it to be just, might fail to defend, in the full confidence that no judgment could be rendered, which the bond would not justify; and then the plaintiff might file his declaration on a bond, forged or paid, for ten times the amount, and recover a judgment which would be irreversible. I think it equally clear, that the statute does not apply to cases of judgments after writs of inquiry, where the writs of inquiry have been awarded on default for want of appearance. The principle is precisely the same in both cases, and it applies 423 more forcibly *to the latter than to the former; for in the latter, the plaintiff may, in his declaration, not only enlarge the amount claimed in his writ, but he may change the form of action altogether. He may bring his action on an uncontested account, and may then file his declaration, and go before the jury, for slander or assault and battery. But the statute expressly embraces judgments by nil dicit and non sum informatus; which judgments, we know, are never rendered except where the party has previously appeared: and the party having once appeared, it is his own folly not to see that every thing is correct, or to abandon the case before it is ended. The statute also embraces, in terms, judgments after inquiry of damages. But although these words are general, I do not think they were intended to have a universal application. I think they were intended to apply only to those cases, where, as in the cases of judgments by nil dicit and non sum informatus, there has been a previous appearance by the party. But even this restricted application of the statute is sufficient to embrace the case before us; for here the party had appeared. Therefore, I am of opinion to affirm the judgment.

CARR, J. I am of opinion that this judgment should be affirmed. I concur in the opinion of the president generally. There is one point, however, taken by him, which I have not so carefully examined, as to justify a decided opinion upon it; such examination not being necessary to a decision of the case, in my view of it. That point is, whether the statute of February 1823 embraces the case? There is another point, too, on which the president has not given an opinion, which I must think a strong one in support of the judgment; that is, the statute of jeofails. This, it must be observed, is not a case where there has been no appearance, and where the defendant may be considered wholly ignorant of the proceeding; on the contrary, he was the original actor; he sued out the writ of replevin, and thereby got possession of the goods distrained, and put the 424 *landlord to his avowry. After this, he can by no means (I think) claim the exemption extended to one supposed to be wholly uninformed of the action. He comes within the meaning, as well as the letter of the statute. But it was said, unless you apply the statute of February 1823 to this case, there should have been no writ of inquiry, and then the case would not have been within the statute of jeofails. The reasons given by the president answer this objection, and shew to my mind, that without the aid of the statute of 1823, the writ of inquiry was proper. It was said, that it was the settled law of this court, that the statute of jeofails does not extend to a case like this. I have considered the court as saying (in perhaps more than one case) that where there has been no appearance at all by the defendant, the statute does not embrace the case. Roe v. Baker was cited; and the record does certainly shew, though there had been no regular appearance, the defendant had in fact been in court so far as to obtain one or more continuances. I have no recollection of the argument, of the conferences, or the particular opinions of the court; I cannot therefore think that it was a case much argued or examined, by the bar or bench; or that we meant to settle the practice by it. I have looked in vain among my papers for a note of the argument, or my own remarks. It is, therefore, a naked decision, which, however I may have then decided, I must confess seems to me now to have been directly within the statute of jeofails. I have always thought, that (however we, in our private judgment, might suppose the legislature had covered too much ground by that statute) we were bound, nevertheless, to administer it, according to the spirit in which it was passed, and extend its provisions to every case, within the view of the law makers.

TUCKER, P., then said, he concurred with the other judges, that the case was within the provisions of the statute of jeofails.

Judgment affirmed.

425 Rogers & Brothers v. Marshall and Others.*

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Judgments—Ca. Sa.—Execution of Mortgages between Judgment and Service of Ca. Sa.—Priority.—A. recovers a judgment against B. at August term, and sues out a ca. sa. thereon in October, under which B. is taken in execution, and in November takes the oath of insolvency, and is discharged, under Judgments—Execution of Ca. Sa.—Effect.—In Leake v. Ferguson, 2 Gratt. 432. it is said, the creditor here resorted to the ca. sa., and after taking out the ca. sa. and having it executed he can no longer stand on the lien of the judgment, citing Rogers v. Marshall, 4 Leigh 425. This is certainly true, under the decisions of this court so far as respects the creditor, and with respect to debtor on whom the ca. sa. is executed. Yet the services of the ca. sa. is not an actual discharge of the judgment.

Also, in Werdenbaugh v. Reid, 20 W. Va. 592, it is the statute for the relief of insolvent debtors: in the interval between the date of A.'s judgment and the service of his ca. sa. on B. sundry mortgages are executed by B. and duly recorded, to secure sundry debts to other creditors: HELD, that by the actual service of A.'s ca. sa. on B. the lien of A.'s judgment was destroyed, and A. could then stand only on the lien given to the ca. sa. executed by the statute of executions, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 184, § 10, and that, therefore, the mortgagees are entitled to the benefit of their mortgages.

Rogers & brothers recovered a judgment against Lane, for 745 dollars with interest and costs, in the county court of Frederick, at August term 1823, and sued out a capias ad satisfaciendum thereon, in October, returnable December, following. Lane, being already in custody of the sheriff under other writs of ca. sa. sued out by other creditors, was charged in execution under the ca. sa. of Rogers & brothers also; and on the 4th November 1823, he took the oath of insolvency; and was discharged, in all the cases, under the act for relief of insolvent debtors.

After the date of the judgment recovered by Rogers & brothers against Lane, and before their execution, or any of the other executions sued out against his body, had been served upon him, several deeds executed by Lane conveying property for the security, satisfaction and indemnification of other creditors, were duly recorded: namely, 1. three deeds of trust, one dated the 18th April, and the other two the 9th August, and all recorded on the 12th August, 1823, conveying sundry real estate to Thomas Marshall, trustee, in trust to secure debts amounting to 1372 dollars due to A. C. Cazenove and A. C. Cazenove & Co. 2. A deed of trust, dated the 22nd August and recorded the 15th September 1823, conveying other real estate to the same Thomas 426 *Marshall, in trust to indemnify William Vanmetre and James Wray against suretyships and other responsibilities they had incurred for Lane.

There was another deed alleged to have been executed by Lane, on the day when Rogers & brothers recovered their judgment, conveying sundry personal property to W. Robertson, in trust for the security and indemnification of Vanmetre; but this deed not being in the record, the date of the execution and of the registry thereof, did not appear. And there were two deeds of assignment to Vanmetre, of sundry debts due to Lane, dated the 22nd August 1823.

In the schedule of his effects made by Lane, on taking the oath of insolvency, was included his equity of redemption of the mortgaged subject comprised in all the foregoing deeds, and sundry other property likewise under prior incumbrances.

Rogers & brothers exhibited their bill in said, the writ of ca. sa. was by statute expressly made a lien on all the real and personal estate of the debtor from the time it was levied. But this lien, while express, conferred upon the creditor an inchoate right until the debtor took the oath of insolvency; if he died in jail the security of the creditor was lost. Citing Stuart v. Hamilton, 8 Leigh 507; Rogers v. Marshall, 4 Leigh 425. The principal case is also cited on this subject in Foot-note to Jackson v. Helskell, 1 Leigh 267; Foot-note to Foreman v. Loyd, 2 Leigh 284.

the superior court of chancery of Winchester, against Lane, the trustees, and the cestuis que trust, setting forth the facts above stated, insisting that as their judgment against Lane was recovered before the deeds executed by him for the benefit of Cazenove, Cazenove & Co., Vanmetre and Wray, and Vanmetre, were recorded, and indeed before all but one of them were executed, they had, by force of the judgment, a prior lien on the real estate of Lane mortgaged and conveyed by the deeds; and were entitled to have satisfaction of their judgment out of the trust subject, in preference to the cestuis que trust; alleging also, that the deeds executed for the benefit of Vanmetre, were executed to delay and hinder Lane's creditors in the recovery of their just claims, and were fraudulent in fact; and praying that all the deeds might be set aside, and the property thereby mortgaged sold for the satisfaction of their judgment; and general relief.

The defendants, in their answers, insisted, that Rogers & brothers, by the suing out and levying of their ca. sa. against Lane, had lost the lien of their judgment, and thenceforth were only entitled to the lien of their ca. sa.

427 *executed, under the provision of the statute (1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 10, p. 528); and as that statute made the ca. sa. executed a lien on the real estate of the debtor, only from the time the execution was served, and the deeds under which the defendants claimed having been all recorded before the ca. sa. sued out by Rogers & brothers was served on Lane, therefore the cestuis que trust, claiming under those deeds, were entitled to the full benefit of them. And Vanmetre denied the allegations of fraud imputed to the transactions in which he was concerned.

The chancellor dismissed the bill as to Marshall, the trustee, A. C. Cazenove, and Cazenove & Co. as to whom the controversy turned wholly on the question of law presented by the pleadings; and Rogers & brothers appealed from the decree to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Johnson for the appellants, and Leigh for the appellees.

I. Johnson premised, that the judgment recovered by Rogers & brothers against Lane, gave them a lien on all the real estate then held by the debtor; and that, therefore, at the time when the deeds were executed, under which Cazenove and Cazenove & Co. claimed, the real estate thereby mortgaged by Lane to them, was subject to the lien of the judgment, and the deeds only passed the title to the trustee subject to that incumbrance. And then he contended, that the subsequent suing out of the ca. sa. by Rogers & brothers, and the service thereof on Lane, did not destroy the lien of the judgment. For, he argued, that though the effect of the suing out and service of the ca. sa. at common law, might have been to deprive the judgment creditors of their right to sue out an elegit on their judgment, and so to destroy the lien of the judgment on the debtor's lands, yet the law was altered, in this respect, by the provision in the statute of executions, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 10, whereby the ca. sa. executed was made a lien on the whole of the lands of the debtor from the time of levying the writ.

428 *The judgment was a lien on a moiety of the debtor's lands, which continued in full force till the ca. sa. was served on the debtor; and then, this provision of the statute made the ca. sa. executed a lien on the whole of them. That which gave a lien on the whole, could not justly be construed to take away the previous lien on the moiety. This statute, he insisted, was intended to give the creditor suing out the ca. sa. a more beneficial lien on the debtor's lands, than his judgment gave him; not to destroy the lien of the judgment on the moiety, but to preserve and include it in the lien of the ca. sa. executed on the whole. And he referred to the case of Fox v. Rootes, as an authority in point. In that case, he said, certain creditors had obtained a decree against Rootes; after which Rootes executed a deed of trust, conveying real estate for the benefit of other creditors, of whom Fox was one: the creditors claiming under the decree, sometime after the execution of the deed of trust, sued out a ca. sa. upon their decree against Rootes, which was executed on him, and he discharged from custody under the act for the relief of insolvent debtors: and this court held, that the creditors claiming under the decree, were entitled, notwithstanding their ca. sa. executed on Rootes, to have satisfaction of their decree out of the lands which had been mortgaged in the meantime by Rootes's deed of trust, in preference to Fox, whose debt was secured by the deed.

Leigh, for the appellees, said it was clear law, that the lien of a judgment on the lands of the debtor, was only the consequence of the capacity of the creditor to sue out an elegit on his judgment, and extend the lands to satisfy the debt; and that if a ca. sa. be sued out on a judgment, and the debtor be actually taken and charged in execution under that process, the creditor can never afterwards have an elegit on his judgment. The 10th section of the statute of executions made a ca. sa. executed a lien on the whole of the debtor's lands, from the time of the service of that process; but this lien was wholly distinct from, and indeed incompatible with, the lien of the judgment. And

429 In Jackson v. Heiskell, 1 Leigh 257, 270, 278, it was agreed by the counsel, and it was the opinion of the judges, that a judgment creditor who sues out an execution against the body of his debtor, and levies it, surrenders the lien of his judgment by having elected this process of execution; that the lien of the judgment can never be revived but by the death of the debtor in execution, or his escape or rescue; that in lieu of the lien of the judgment, so surrendered, he obtains the statutory lien of the execution, commencing at the date of its levy; and that this lien has no relation back, so as to affect any prior right of creditor or purchaser, but every fair purchaser and creditor, whose rights are prior in time, have preference by law. As to Fox v. Rootes, he said, it was heard before a court of three judges, and there was such a remarkable diversity of opinion among them on the several points involved in the case, that the judges themselves, sensible that the adjudication could settle no principle, desired that it should not be reported. It was manifest from the decree, that the opinion, in that case, on the point mentioned by the appellants' counsel, was founded on the very peculiar circumstances of the case.

430 *II. Johnson said, that supposing the principle of the decree right, yet the bill ought not to have been dismissed as to the appellees: they should have been retained in court, in order that the chancellor might compel the execution of the trust for the benefit of the cestuis que trust and of the judgment creditors, and appropriate the surplus, if any, to the satisfaction of the judgment.

Leigh said, this was a matter of very little importance. It was plain enough there could be little or no surplus; and whatever there might be, would vest in the sheriff for the benefit of the ca. sa. creditors, at whose suit Lane was in custody when he took the oath of insolvency; and some of them, who are not parties

431 to this suit, had priority over *Rogers & brothers. Besides, the object of the bill was to set aside the deeds; and it was only in case they should be set aside, that a sale of the subject was prayed.

CARR, J. The principal argument relied on by the counsel for the appellants, was, that when the deeds of trust were executed, the property was subject to the lien of the judgment recovered by Rogers & brothers against Lane, and passed, thus incumbered, to the trustee, Marshall; and that the subsequent issuing of the ca. sa. upon the judgment, and the service thereof upon Lane, did not affect the lien of the judgment: for, though it was admitted that the issuing of the ca. sa. and taking the body of the debtor in 432 *execution, would, at common law, have destroyed the lien of the judgment, which springs from the capacity of the creditor to take out an elegit, it was contended, that the provisions of our law of executions changed all this, by making a ca. sa. when levied, a lien on the whole estate of the debtor, real and personal. The judgment, it was said, bound half of the land to the moment of levying the

*The case of Fox's adm'r v. Rootes and others was an appeal from a decree of the superior court of chancery of Fredericksburg, which was decided in December 1828. There were only three judges present at the hearing—CABELL, COALTER and CARR. The following is a copy of the decree:

A majority of the court is of opinion, that the plaintiffs claiming under the deed from Rootes senior to Fox, dated the 1st March 1821, are purchasers for valuable consideration, and as such, within the protection of that part of our statute of frauds, which is substantially taken from 27 Eliz. ch. 4. They have, therefore, an undoubted right to apply to a court of equity for the purpose of removing out of their way, any obstruction to the fair and just enforcement of their incumbrance. With respect to the deed executed by Thomas Rootes senior to his son Thomas Rootes, bearing date the 18th February 1813, purporting to convey to his son the Gouldhill tract of land in the proceedings mentioned, and which deed it is the object of the bill to set aside, it appears, to a majority of the court, 1. that this was a voluntary deed; 2. that it was not recorded until eight years after its date; 3. that, during all the intervening time, the existence of the deed was carefully concealed from the world; the grantor remained in full possession of the land from the year 1817, and exercised over it every act of ownership, with the knowledge and assent of the grantee. A majority of the court is, therefore, of opinion, that as to the purchasers under the deed to Fox, and the decree creditors, also parties to this suit, the said deed of 1813, is fraudulent and void. With respect to the priorities between the purchasers under Fox's deed, and the decree creditors, the court is of opinion, that all these creditors take precedence of the purchasers: Baylor's creditors, 1. on the ground of actual notice; and 2. because at the date of the deed to Fox, the lien of their decrees was in full force; Dunlop, because though it does not appear, that he had taken out execution within the year, yet as his decree is stated in Fox's deed as an existing debt, and provision therein made for its payment, those claiming under that deed are purchasers with full notice of the decree, and cannot be received, especially in equity, to contest its priority of lien. As to the decree creditors before the court, it appears that they are, 1st. Dunlop, who obtained a decree in 1818; and 2ndly, Baylor's creditors, namely Martin's ex'ors, Graves, Hoomes, Guy, Jones's ex'ors, Talliaferro, Chiles's adm'r, Pemberton and Tenant (these nine being represented by Battalle), also Catlett, Davis, Grinnun, Green and Patton, all of whom obtained decrees in the same suit in 1820. A majority of the court is of opinion, that as between these two classes of creditors, Dunlop has priority; though it has been decided, that a judgment creditor, who has suffered the year to elapse without taking out execution, cannot afterwards overreach in equity, a bona fide purchaser of the debtor's land (such purchase being made after the year), yet this applies, neither in terms nor in principle, to a subsequent judgment creditor, who has not laid out his money on the land, nor trusted the debtor on that fund, but on his general credit; and the same majority considers it a settled rule, that when, in equity, the question is as to the priority of judgment creditors, they are ranked according to the date of their judgments, without inquiring, as between them, whether such judgments have been kept alive by process: the capacity to renew by scire facias being, in such case, considered in that forum as sufficient proof of the lien; provided it appears, that these judgments are still due. Under this rule, the majority of the court think, that Dunlop must be first satisfied; next Baylor's creditors, pari passu. It appears, that most of these creditors have issued writs of ca. sa. on one of their instalments, which have been served on Rootes, and under which he has taken the benefit of the insolvent debtor's oath. It is the opinion of a majority of the court, that this proceeding cannot, as a court of equity, postpone these creditors, as to that instalment, to the purchasers under Fox's deed, because that deed being made for the security both of the purchasers and those creditors, whatever effort the latter made to procure from another source, satisfaction of their decrees, was an effort to assist and benefit the purchasers, by lessening the amount for which their security was liable. As it does not appear with certainty, what has been made under the executions of Baylor's creditors, and what are the balances due them, the chancellor very properly referred this matter to a commissioner, and also correctly ordered, that in the meantime Gouldhill should be sold, and the proceeds held subject to the future disposition of the court. It is the opinion of a majority of the court, that whatever of this fund shall remain after satisfying the decree creditors aforesaid, shall be applied in the order directed by Fox's deed, to the payment of the purchasers under that deed; and should there still be a surplus, it is not the intention of the court, by any thing in this opinion or decree, to affect the disposition thereof. The court says nothing in this opinion and decree, on the subject of the deed of 1813, conveying the slaves from Rootes senior to Rootes junior, or as to the disposition of said slaves, because it does not consider that subject to be before it; nor is it intended by this decree, to decide at all to as the validity or character of the deeds, from Rootes senior to Prosser. Therefore, it is decreed and ordered, that so much of the decree aforesaid as conflicts with the foregoing opinion, be reversed and annulled, and the residue thereof affirmed &c. And it is ordered, that the cause be remanded to the said court of chancery to be further proceeded in according to the principles of this decree.—Note in Original Edition.

*In the following cases Fox v. Rootes is cited: Counts v. Walker, 2 Leigh 283; Claiborne v. Gross, 7 Leigh 345; Stuart v. Hamilton, 8 Leigh 508, 509; Taylor v. Spindle, 2 Gratt. 68, 70; foot-note to McClung v. Belrne, 10 Leigh 304.

ca. sa.; and how, it was asked, could that destroy the lien on the half, which gave to the same party a lien on the whole? It is, certainly, the rule of the common law, that if the debtor's body be taken on a ca. sa. it is a satisfaction of the debt, and the creditor can have no other execution, and especially he cannot have an elegit. The few exceptions to this rule, as was justly said by counsel in the argument of Jackson v. Heiskell, "are founded on after circumstances, which defeat the effect of the process, and disappoint the creditor of that satisfaction, which the law supposes such process to afford; as rescue, escape, or death of the debtor in execution." The authorities for this doctrine are cited in that case. In that case, too, the judges who were inclined to give the ca. sa. lien the greatest extent (and whose opinions for going so far, have been since overruled, Foreman v. Loyd, 2 Leigh 284,) admitted, that no creditor, after taking out a ca. sa. and getting it executed, could stand upon the lien of the judgment.

The appellants' counsel relied upon the decision in the case of Fox v. Rootes; on that point in the case, where the court, in comparing the liens of the creditors under the decree, and the purchasers under the deed of trust, did not consider the deed as destroying the lien of the decree creditors, though they had sued out writs of ca. sa. on their decree, on which, the debtor's body had been taken in execution, and he was discharged on taking the oath of insolvency under the act for the relief of insolvent debtors. It might be a sufficient answer to that case, to say that, according to the rule of this court, it is not authority;

433 of a court of three judges: but, *in justice to my brethren, with whom I sat and from whom I differed as to that point, I must observe, that they by no means intended to lay down this as general doctrine, but simply as the result of the peculiar circumstances of that case. This is apparent from the language of the decree, which is as follows: "It appears, that most of these creditors [the creditors by decree] have issued writs of ca. sa. on one of their instalments, which have been served on Rootes, and under which he has taken the benefit of the insolvent debtor's act. It is the opinion of a majority of the court, that this proceeding cannot, in a court of equity, postpone these creditors as to that instalment, to the purchasers under Fox's deed; because that deed being made for the security both of the purchasers and these creditors, whatever effort the latter made to procure from another source, satisfaction of their decree, was an effort to assist and benefit the purchasers, by lessening the amount for which their security was liable."

Another objection to the decree was, that it dismissed the bill of the plaintiffs as to the appellees, instead of keeping those parties in court, and superintending the sale of the mortgaged subject, and distribution of the proceeds, so that, in case of any surplus, it might have been applied to the judgment of these plaintiffs. The answer is, that the bill had no such object; it was brought simply to remove these deeds out of the plaintiffs' way as fraudulent. It is too, apparent enough, that the fund was utterly inadequate to the satisfaction of the prior liens; and the knowledge of this, was probably the reason, why the plaintiffs preferred to take an appeal from the decree immediately, instead of asking the court to take management of the fund, and give them any surplus which might remain.

I think the decree must be affirmed.

CABELL, J. I have been always surprised to hear the case of Fox v. Rootes referred to as authority; at least, as to those points which received the sanction 434 of two only of *the three judges who sat in the case. This court consists of five judges; and although three of them, being a majority, constitute a court competent to decide any case which may be brought before it, yet a point decided on the opinion of two only of the three judges so constituting a court, is never regarded as authority; such opinion decides the case as between the parties, but does not settle the law of the land. In consequence of this well established principle, the case of Fox v. Rootes, though most elaborately and ably argued at the bar, and most gravely considered by the court, was directed not to be reported; and such was the diversity of opinion among the judges, the majority consisting on some points of one set of judges and on others of another, that they determined not even to deliver their opinions in court, but simply to embody in the decree, the points, on which the court, or a majority, were found to agree.

That case has been referred to in the argument of this, as establishing the general principle, that a person obtaining a judgment, and having a ca. sa. levied on the body of his debtor, who is duly discharged under the insolvent law, still has the benefit of the lien of his judgment, so as to overreach an incumbrance created by the debtor between the date of the judgment and the levy of the execution. I sat in Fox v. Rootes, and was one of "the majority of the court, who thought that, under the circumstances of the case, the creditor by decree, who had resorted to the ca. sa. and had pursued his debtor to insolvency, did not lose the lien of his prior decree;" and I will remember, that I came to that opinion, not as the result of any general principle, but as the result of the particular circumstances of the case. Indeed, this is manifest from the language of the decree itself, as has been shewn by my brother Carr. Whether the circumstances relied on by the majority of the court, justified their opinion on that point, it is not material to inquire, there being no such circumstances in the case now before us. We have now nothing to decide but the general principle; and I am clearly of opinion, as I was when I 435 decided Fox v. Rootes*, that, in the absence of particular circumstances, a creditor who resorts to his ca. sa. and pursues his debtor until he is discharged under the insolvent act, loses the lien of his decree or judgment; that particular lien being merged in the superiour lien of the ca. sa. executed, and being forever discharged by the ca. sa. having had its full effect.

I, therefore, think the decree before us was right, as to the main point in the cause. And I concur with judge Carr, for the reasons given by him, as to the propriety of the dismissal of the bill. If there is really any probability that a surplus will remain after the satisfaction of the creditors under the deeds of trust, the appellants will be at liberty, notwithstanding the dismissal of this bill, to institute a new suit for the purpose of reaching it. I am for affirming the decree.

TUCKER, P. I concur with my brethren on the main point; but I am of opinion that the decree is erroneous in dismissing the bill as to the appellees; because, though they have preference, yet this being, in effect, a bill by a judgment creditor to redeem prior incumbrances, they should be a party to the decree. To sell an equity of redemption at public auction, subject to a deed of trust, the amount due upon which cannot be known, as the original debt may have been reduced by payments, is inadmissible. Whoever purchases must purchase at hazard, and of course the sale must always be a sacrifice; ruinous to the mortgagor, or perhaps to other creditors. In such cases, it is therefore always proper that the junior incumbrancer should convene all the prior incumbrancers before the court. Gilm. 133. There is a further reason, I think: as a general rule, sales ought not to be made where the legal title does not pass by the sale. Purchasers of equities always purchase at risque, and sales at risque always tend to sacrifices. To decree a sale at risque would seem, indeed, at variance with the principles of the court.

though I will not say no case can occur in which it would be permitted. My opinion is that the decree should be reversed, with the intimation however of the opinion of this court, that the cestui que trust creditors have a preferable right to payment.

Decree affirmed.

Lee v. Patillo.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Awards—Misbehavior of Arbitrators—Effect.—Award of arbitrators set aside, on the ground of circumstances in their conduct, amounting to misbehavior, though not to corruption, and resulting in injustice to one of the parties.

Patillo exhibited a bill in the county court of Charlotte in chancery, at November term 1820, alleging, that he had employed Lee, a carpenter, to build him a house of particular dimensions, and to do some other carpenter's work for him: that after the work was completed, Patillo, thinking Lee's bills unreasonably high, refused to pay them, but agreed with him to submit the prices of the work to Degraffenreidt and Tisdale, or in case of disagreement their umpire: that the arbitrators did not ascertain the quantity of timber used in the work, nor measure the work, but confined themselves altogether to the prices that ought to be charged for such work; that the work charged in Lee's bills, at the prices fixed by the arbitrators amounted to 2633 dollars: that when the award was presented to Patillo, he told Lee he believed he had charged in his bills more work than he had done; upon which Lee promised to have an accurate calculation made of the work and materials, and that, in this respect, the award should not be considered conclusive: that on this promise, Patillo gave his bond to Lee for 720 dollars, the balance due him, according to the estimate of the arbitrators, *after deducting previous payments made by Patillo: that by an estimate, which Patillo had since had made by a skilful carpenter, the quantity of timber in the work (for hewing and sawing of which the arbitrators allowed Lee, 8s. 6d. per hundred) was less by more than a third than the quantity charged in Lee's bills, and he doubted not there were other errors in the bills: that Patillo had since applied to Lee, to unite with him in appointing two persons to measure the work, and ascertain the quantity of timber used therein; but Lee refused to do so; sometimes denying his promise at the time Patillo gave his bond, to correct errors of this kind, and alleging that this matter had been settled by the arbitrators; and sometimes alleging, that it was impossible for any persons now to ascertain the quantity of timber used and of work done: that Patillo had made sundry payments in part discharge of his bond to Lee; and that Lee had brought suit on the bond, and recovered judgment for the balance due thereon. Therefore, the bill prayed an injunction to restrain Lee from further proceedings on his judgment at law; and that the quantity of timber used and work done by Lee should be ascertained, and credit allowed Patillo for any overcharge in Lee's bills; and general relief.

Awards—Misbehavior of Arbitrators—Effect.—For the proposition that an award of arbitrators will be set aside on the ground of circumstances in their conduct, amounting to misbehavior, though not to corruption, resulting in injustice to one of the parties, the principal case is cited and followed in Shipman v. Fletcher, 82 Va. 600. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Dickinson v. Railroad Co., 7 W. Va. 430. Also, on the question as to when an award of arbitrators will be set aside, the principal case is cited in Fluharty v. Beatty, 22 W. Va. 706; foot-note to McCormick v. Blackford, 4 Gratt. 133; foot-note to Portsmouth v. Norfolk County, 31 Gratt. 727.

Lee's bills for the work done, with the prices extended by the arbitrators, and the award of the arbitrators at the foot thereof, were exhibited with the bill. The award was in these words: "We T. Degraffenreidt, W. Tisdale and W. Parrotte, as arbitrators upon the bills and vouchers produced, have settled it up agreeably to our judgments this 15th August 1818,"—signed by the arbitrators.

Lee, in his answer, stated, that the work done by him for Patillo, and the particulars thereof, appeared in his bills for the same, now exhibited by Patillo: that it was not true that the submission to arbitration was confined to the prices; it was made for the purpose of settling the whole matter in dispute relative to the work, and the arbitrators did actually settle the whole matter;

Degraffenreidt and Tisdale went 438 *to the house, viewed the work, compared it with Lee's bills, and chose Parrotte as their umpire; and these three made the award: that Patillo did not execute his bond to Lee, on the terms mentioned in the bill; on the contrary, Patillo proposed to give his bond, about which Lee was indifferent, as he held the bills for the work and the arbitration; but, at Patillo's request, he received the bond, as a full and complete settlement, and gave up the bills and the award, which he would not have done if he had considered the matter still unsettled: that after the bond was executed, Patillo said, jestingly, that he would be glad for his own satisfaction, to have the work accurately measured, to which Lee answered that he might for his own satisfaction get it done if he could; but Lee never promised to do it himself, nor did he intimate, before or after the execution of the bond, that he would unsettle the award or bond again: that Patillo, sometime afterwards applied to Lee to have a remeasurement of the work and timber, to which Lee answered he would never refuse any thing that was right; and the same request to have the work remeasured, being repeated by Patillo, he told him, he had often declined, and then positively refused, to do so: that he considered himself no wise bound to measure the work now: and he insisted, that the award, and the bond given by Patillo was a complete settlement; but, he averred, his bills for the timber and work were accurate as to the quantity, and went into the particulars to shew that they were so.

The affidavits of several witnesses were taken and filed by the parties, to the following effect:

1. Thomas Lee deposed (in two affidavits) that he was present at a conversation between the parties in the summer of 1820 [after Lee had brought suit on Patillo's bond] in which Lee agreed, that when Patillo gave him the bond, he required that the calculations of the quantities of materials and work should still be made, to which Lee answered he was willing to any thing that was right; but though Lee admitted that this conversation had passed, he 439 added, that *he did not think, then or now, that it was right to remeasure the work.

2. Two carpenters, Hannah and Perry, deposed, that they had carefully examined and measured the work which was shewn them by Patillo (Lee not being present) and ascertained the quantity of timber in the whole work to be 25,922 feet. (Lee's bills on which the award was founded, stated the quantity to be 33,194 feet.)

3. Degraffenreidt, one of the arbitrators deposed, that he and Tisdale, after undertaking the arbitration, separately viewed the work, in order to see the manner in which it was executed: that they afterwards met to make the arbitration and named Parrotte for their umpire (Lee being present, Patillo not): that they took the bills of the work done by Lee, as furnished by him, and extended the prices, without entering into any calculations of the quantity of work or materials, Degraffenreidt and Tisdale not having seen it together, and Parrotte the umpire having never seen it at all: that Patillo had requested that a calculation should be made of the quantity of materials and work, expressing his opinion that there were considerable errors in this respect; but as Degraffenreidt declined this service, and understood that Tisdale had done so likewise, he considered that the prices alone were submitted to arbitration, and the arbitrators acted only on the prices: that Degraffenreidt's own price for hewing and sawing was six shillings per hundred, and he had done some at 5 dollars per thousand. (In the arbitration, Lee was allowed 8s. 6d. per hundred.)

4. The arbitrator Tisdale deposed, that Lee's work was done in a workmanlike manner: that he and the other arbitrator were called upon to settle the prices; but he considered, that the arbitration was to be a final settlement between the parties, and that a calculation as to the quantity of materials used in the work was part of the business of the arbitration, because Lee furnished them with a bill of the work, which bill was not disputed by Patillo: and he deposed that his price for hewing and sawing was 7s. 6d. per hundred.

440 *5. There were two depositions of P. Endaly, taken to prove and overcharge in Lee's bills as to the quantity of wagonage in halling the timber. His statements were very confused, and somewhat contradictory.

6. There were depositions, as to the usual mode of measuring such work in that part of the country; and

7. Depositions, taken to prove that timbers cannot be accurately measured after they are worked up in a house.

In this state of the evidence the cause was set down for hearing in the county court, February 1822; but it was not heard till June term 1824, when on Patillo's motion, the county court gave him leave to file

An amended bill, in which Patillo charged the arbitrators and the umpire, or a majority of them with partiality and corruption, and founded the charge upon their depositions: for that, 1st, the arbitrators took Lee's wills as to the quantity of work and materials, without any calculation of their own or measurement: 2ndly, that, though they had set lower prices on some of the smaller items than Lee had charged, they had allowed on the heaviest items higher prices than he claimed; and on the heaviest item of all (the charge for hewing and sawing 33,194 feet of timber) they had allowed Lee 8s. 6d. per hundred, when according to Degraffenreidt's deposition, his own highest charge for such work was only 6s. and according to Tisdale's, his rate of charge was but 7s. 6d. and when even Lee's charge was but 7s. 6d. in a bill rendered to Patillo, which he had handed to the arbitrators: 3rdly, that Lee, in a lumping charge for certain parts of the work, had charged 200 dollars, but the arbitrators had allowed him 380 dollars; and they had moreover made him an allowance of 30 dollars "for work not mentioned in Lee's bills."

Lee put in his answer to the amended bill at the same term, stating that the arbitrators did measure the work, and insisting that their conduct in fixing the prices, was impartial, fair and just.

441 *And on the same day on which he put in his answer, he moved the court to dissolve the injunction; which motion the court overruled, because the answer to the amended bill had not been filed till that day. Whereupon Lee presented a petition to the superiour court of chancery, praying an appeal from the order of the county court overruling the motion to dissolve the injunction; which was allowed.

In the superiour court of chancery, in October 1825, the motion to dissolve the injunction was renewed; but the chancellor overruled it, and ordered the injunction to stand till the hearing; and, at the same time, by the consent of the parties, he appointed three persons to measure the work done by Lee for Patillo, to fix the prices thereof, and to settle all other matters in relation thereto, and make report of the same to the court.

The commissioners made a long report of their proceedings in execution of the order; shewing the manner in which they had measured and ascertained the quantities of timber and of work done, and settled the prices, with all the details. It appeared by their measurement, that the quantity of timber hewed and sawed by Lee, was 26,497 feet, instead of 33,194 feet charged in Lee's bills on which the arbitrators acted, and that there were several other overcharges in those bills. And the result was, that Patillo had, already, as early as the 7th December 1819, paid Lee the sum of 300 dollars, over and above the just amount to which he was entitled.

Lee filed several exceptions to the report; but they were all the same, in substance; viz. that the commissioners had, without reason or justice, disregarded the accounts as settled by the arbitrators, both as to the quantity of work, and the prices.

The depositions of the arbitrators were taken anew, and filed.

1. Tisdale deposed, that, at the request of the parties, he went with Lee to Patillo's, to view and arbitrate the carpenter's work done for him by Lee: that Patillo told him

442 *Degraffenreidt was to be the other arbitrator, but he was not present; that he, Tisdale, viewed the work: that he asked Patillo, whether he disputed the quantity or quality of the work; and he said he did not; that he called on them merely because he was not a judge himself; that Tisdale might view the work then, and Degraffenreidt might view it at another time, and when they met, if they should disagree, they might call in a third person. The arbitrators appointed Parrotte their umpire, and the three met and settled the work.

2. Degraffenreidt deposed, that he examined the work in the presence of the parties, the other arbitrator Tisdale being absent: that it was then agreed by the parties, that Tisdale and he should settle the work, and, if they should disagree, call in a third person: that they did disagree, and called in Parrotte, and the three settled the work: that Patillo observed to him, Degraffenreidt, that he thought Lee's bill very high, and especially, the hewing and sawing appeared to him enormous; and he expressed a wish that the arbitrators should make some calculation to see whether the bill for hewing and sawing was correct or not; but, not doubting the correctness of Lee, they did not enter into a calculation of any part of the work done: that the deponent saw Lee's bills for the hewing and sawing, and supposed them to be correct from the view he had of the work.

Upon the final hearing, the chancellor overruled Lee's exceptions to the report of the commissioners, and approved the same; perpetuated the injunction awarded by the county court to Lee's judgment at law against Patillo; and moreover decreed, that Lee should pay Patillo, the sum of 300 dollars with interest from the 7th December 1819 (that being the sum appearing by the report to have been then overpaid by him to Lee on account of the work by him done). From this decree, Lee appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Johnson for the appellant, and Leigh for the appellee. The argument consisted, 443 *chiefly, in a critical examination of the pleadings and the proofs, and of the same matters of details, which are discussed in the opinions of the judges.

CARR, J. The principles which govern awards, have been so often, and so solemnly settled by this court, that it would be an idle waste of time to state them again, or to cite the authorities on which they rest. If there be any thing settled in the law, it seems to be this, that to set aside an award, you must shew either a mistake apparent upon its face, or misbehaviour in the arbitrators. The court may be fully satisfied that the award has operated injustice, yet if the mistake be not upon its face, and there be no proof of partiality or corruption, it will not touch it. Whether these rules are wise or not, whether this domestic forum is to be cherished or discouraged, will hardly (I presume) at this day, be considered open questions.

That there is no mistake apparent upon the face of the award, seemed to be admitted, and must, I think, be taken as a clear point.

The first bill states, that Patillo employed Lee to do some carpenter's work; and after the work was finished, considering his bills unreasonably high, he refused to pay them; whereupon, they agreed to submit the prices of the work to the decision of Degraffenreidt and Tisdale, or their umpire: that the arbitrators confined themselves to price, taking Lee's bills for amount of work: that when Patillo received the award, he told Lee he believed he had charged more work than was done; that Lee promised to have an accurate calculation of the work and materials made, and that, in this respect, the award was not to be considered binding and conclusive; and that, upon this agreement, he executed his bond to Lee for 720 dollars, the balance due according to the award: that Lee afterwards, refused all measurement or correction, sued him on the bond, and obtained judgment. If Patillo could have established, either by the answer or by other proof, the agreement, on which 444 *he states that his bond was executed, he would have taken the case off the ground of the award, so far as regarded the amount of work and materials, and would clearly have had a right to the remeasure-ment and calculation agreed on. But in this respect, he has failed. The answer is certainly no admission: Lee there says that the bond was not executed upon the terms mentioned in the bill; but on the contrary Patillo proposed to give his bond, about which he felt indifferent, as he had his bills and the arbitration, but at the request of Patillo, he received a bond, as a full and complete settlement, and gave up all his bills and the award; which he would not have given up, if he had considered the matter as still unsettled. He adds, that after the bond was executed, Patillo said, jestingly, that he would be glad, for his own satisfaction, to have the work accurately measured; and Lee replied he might do so, if he could; but he never promised to do it himself, nor did he intimate, before or after the execution of the bond, that he would unsettle the award or bond again. I think this a positive denial, and being responsive, must be disproved. Is there any evidence that disproves it? Clearly not, in my mind. No witness is produced who was present at the execution of the bond, when Patillo says the agreement to remeasure was made; yet there is a witness to the bond,—a female. If Patillo really disputed the correctness of Lee's bill as to amount of work, is it not strange, that he should, in the first place, have permitted the arbitrators to take it as the basis of their award, and then when he found the award made, and the sum ascertained upon that basis, should have executed his bond for the balance, without one scrip of writing, or any witness to prove a verbal understanding, that he was still to have a right to unsettle every thing that was done? to destroy the very foundation of the award? The only witness who gives evidence touching this point at all, is Thomas Lee: he speaks of a conversation between the parties after the suit at law was brought; and taking his two affidavits together (if I do not misunderstand them, for, the last especially is very ambiguously expressed) they only amount to this, that he heard a conversation between the parties, in which Patillo claimed, that he had required a remeasurement when he executed his bond, and that Lee had said he was willing to do what was right, but did not think a remeasurement right. This, if it were proved by more than one witness, would not amount to any thing like an agreement; but being a single witness against the bond, executed unconditionally, and Lee's positive answer, is of no weight.

The ground, then, upon which the first bill was filed, was wholly unsupported; and the injunction ought to have been dissolved, on the motion made in the county court, and the bill dismissed; but the court being divided, the motion was overruled. This was in June 1821. The case then stood upon an order to take depositions till February 1822, when it was set for hearing by the plaintiff. So it remained till June 1824, when upon the plaintiff's motion, leave was given him to file an amended bill: a permission, which in my judgment, ought never to have been granted under the circumstances of the case, and after the great lapse of time which had taken place.

The new bill charges the arbitrators and their umpire with corruption. The grounds of this charge, as they may be collected from the bill are, 1. that the arbitrators took the bills of Lee as to the amount of work and materials, without examining these points themselves; and 2. that they allowed 8s. 6d. per hundred for hewing and sawing, although their own prices for the same work, were only 6s. and 7s. 6d. These, I believe, are the material points. No evidence is gone into, to prove from the words or the temper of the arbitrators, partiality or corruption; it is rested on their acts as stated above. We must recollect that mere mistake cannot be established by evidence. Do the acts complained of, amount to partiality or corruption?

1. As to taking Lee's bill Degraffenreidt says, that when he met first on the business, Patillo expressed a wish that the bills should be examined as to quantity of materials and *work; but as he declined doing so, and understood that Tisdale also had declined such examinations, he considered the prices alone submitted to their arbitration, and accordingly they acted on the prices only. Tisdale, in his first affidavit, says he viewed the work at the request of both parties; that he did consider the calculation of the work and materials as a part of their business; but that Lee furnished a bill, which was not disputed by Patillo. In his second affidavit, he says, he asked Patillo, whether he disputed the quality or quantity of the work; he said he did not, but that he merely called on them; because he was not a judge; that he might view the work then, and Degraffenreidt might view it at another time; and when they met, if they disagreed, they might call on a third person. Now, when he said that he did not dispute the quantity or quality of the work, but called on them because he was not a judge, what was it he called on them for? Let his original bill sworn to in open court, answer: that states, that believing Lee's bills unreasonably high, he refused to pay them, and he and Lee agreed to submit the prices of the work, to Degraffenreidt and Tisdale. But what ever might have been his original wish, it is clear, that he knew the arbitrators were about to make their award without any measurement or calculation of quantity, and to take Lee's bills as their basis, and that he acquiesced in this proceeding. Degraffenreidt expressly declined such examination; Tisdale considered Lee's bill admitted: Patillo knew these things, and then was his time, to have insisted on the measurement and calculation, if he continued to think them material; but so far from this, it is evident, that in his conversation with Tisdale, he counted on the award being made without them; for he tells him, he might view (not measure and calculate) the work then, and Degraffenreidt might view it at another time, and when they met, if they disagreed, they might call in an umpire. The arbitrators considered their award a final settlement; which could only be upon the ground, that the bill of Lee was admitted; since a subsequent measurement and calculation must remove the *very basis of their work, and throw every thing again up into the wind. But more than all this, when the award was made, and presented to Patillo, he went into a settlement upon it, received a credit for all his payments, executed his bond unconditionally for the balance, and it is not till upwards of two years after, when pressed by a judgment on the bond, that he calls in question by his bill any part of the transaction. Under these circumstances, it surely cannot be imputed to the arbitrators as proof of partiality or corruption, that they took Lee's bills as to quantity of work and materials.

2. The other charge of misbehaviour is, that although the price of Degraffenreidt for hewing and sawing was 6s. per hundred, and that of Tisdale 7s. 6d., yet these arbitrators allowed Lee 8s. 6d.; and if this award had been made by these two men, this would have been, to say the least of it, a strange and suspicious fact. But we are told, on all hands, that if they differed, they were to choose an umpire; they did disagree, and then called on Parrotte. I need not say, that when arbitrators disagree and call in an umpire, the award is in law his, though they may sign it with him. Nor is he, in his decision on any point, bound to agree with either of the arbitrators, or to split the difference between them: he must be guided by his own judgment, free of all control; and, in the absence of all testimony, we must suppose he was so, in fixing this price for hewing and sawing. This then is no ground for fastening upon the arbitrators or the umpire, the charge of corruption.

But it was said, if these arbitrators had no agency in settling the amount of work and materials, it is no part of their award, and has nothing of the sanctity belonging to awards. I consider Lee's bills as the statement of the subject matter, on which the arbitrators were to act; as if the parties had said, here are bills of certain work done and materials found; we cannot agree as to the prices; you must judge between us in fixing them. The bills become thus the very foundation of the award.

448 *But suppose there were no award here at all; suppose that when Lee presented his bills to Patillo, he had examined them for himself, or got some friend better acquainted with the subject, to do it; and that, after such examination, he had settled with Lee, got all his credits, and executed his bond for the balance; and after a judgment on the bond, had attempted to open the whole account from its foundation, and had shewn such a case as is now before us: I, for one, would have refused to open the transaction. Look at the nature of it: no previous bargain is made settling any of the terms: the carpenter goes to work, finds all and does all; the work is finished; and the bill presented, containing a hundred different items,—timbers, wagonage, hewing and sawing, finding, measurement, prices, &c. &c. All is settled, the bills given up, and bond taken; and some six or eight years afterwards, all this is to be ripped up! How can you settle it then? The carpenters tell us, that there is no such thing as ascertaining with any thing like accuracy, the quantity of timbers which have been used in a building. Look at the measurement made by Hannah and Perry, at the instance of Patillo, and without notice to Lee. The persons who made that, tell us, that if they had measured side and edge, there would have been no material difference between their bill and Lee's; and many witnesses tell us, that this was the usual mode at the time the work was done.

It was relied on, that the commissioners who acted under the order of the superior court of chancery, were appointed by consent of the parties by their counsel. I do not consider this as going, in the slightest degree, to shew the assent of Lee to open the transaction, or abandon the ground he occupied under the award. He moved to dissolve the injunction; this motion was overruled; and all done afterwards, was in invitum. Before these commissioners, he protested against their proceeding, and claimed to hold to the award. Look at the testimony as to the wagonage on which the commissioners seem to have rested their report, as to this matter: can any one read the depositions of Endaly, 449 *and give them much credit? Will they not see, that when asked the same questions, by the different parties, he answers them differently?

Upon the whole, I must believe, that to open such a transaction as this, on such ground, will be contrary to the whole current of authority, and fraught with very mischievous consequences. Look at the monstrous result here. The party who had a judgment at law on the bond of the other for 720 dollars with interest and costs, is called into equity, to injoin his judgment; the bill seeks nothing more; yet by this process of resettlement, a balance is produced against him, and a decree entered, not merely to injoin his judgment perpetually, but, in addition, that he pay to the man for whom he built the houses, 300 dollars with interest and costs. I cannot agree to this. I think the decree should be reversed, the injunction dissolved, and the bill dismissed.

CABELL, J. It is manifest that great injustice was done Patillo by the award of the arbitrators; and I think, this injustice may be remedied without the violation of any established principle. I do not say, that these arbitrators were corrupt; but they have reposed a confidence in the unproved representations and statements of one of the parties to the submission, which, to say the least of it, amounts to misbehaviour, if not to partiality.

The language of the bill is so defective in precision, that if we were to look to that alone, we might, perhaps, be somewhat in doubt as to the extent of the submission; whether it embraced the quantity, as well as the prices, of the work. But when we look to the conduct of the parties, and to the evidence in the cause, there can be no doubt, but that the whole subject of the work was referred; quantity, quality and prices. Lee expressly swears it in his answers; for he says, that it was not true that the reference was confined to the prices, but it was for the purpose of settling the whole matter in dispute relative to the said work &c Tisdale, one of the arbitrators, says that 450 at the first meeting of *the parties (the other arbitrators not being present) he asked Patillo, whether he disputed the quality or quantity of the work; he said he did not, but that he merely called on them because he was not a judge of it himself. Surely this did not mean, that he acquiesced in Lee's bill in these respects. If that were the case, why call on them at all? Not knowing whether the bills were right or wrong, he could not, as an honest man, dispute it; but left it for them to decide. Degraffenreidt, the other arbitrator, says, that when he first met the parties, Patillo requested, that the calculation of the quantity of materials and work should be made, and expressed his opinion that considerable error existed in this respect. Now, let us see what was the conduct of the arbitrators. It is admitted, that they made no inquiry into, nor any estimate of, the quantity of materials or of work, but were guided intirely by Lee's bills. Tisdale says, he did not make any calculation, because Patillo did not dispute the bills in these respects. I have shewn already that he did not admit them. It was, consequently, the duty of the arbitrators to make the necessary inquiries to satisfy themselves of their justice. Degraffenreidt repeats in his second deposition, what he had said in the first, as to Patillo's anxiety on this subject; that he observed, that he thought Lee's bills were very high, and especially the hewing and sawing appeared to him to be enormous; and that he expressed a wish that the arbitrators should make some calculation to see whether it was correct in these respects. It is worthy of remark, that these objections, made in the presence of the arbitrators, related only to quantities of work and materials; for Lee's bills as submitted to them contained no prices; yet the arbitrators made no estimate of quantities whatever. I have given the reason assigned by one of them for this omission. Then let us hear the other: Degraffenreidt, after relating Patillo's anxiety for them to make the calculation, says, that not doubting the correctness of Lee, they did not enter into a calculation of any part of the work done for Patillo. And as to the umpire, he never saw the work at all. I cannot sanction an award thus made.

451 *Nor do I think the bond given by Patillo precludes him from seeking redress in equity. He says in his bill, that at the time the bond was given, there was an agreement that there should be a remeasurement of the work. Lee professes to deny this; but I do not believe him. His answer appears to me to be an equivocation. In another part of his answer, he has stated what is certainly false; for he says that the arbitrators went to the house, viewed the work and compared it with his bill; in which last particular, he is contradicted by both of them. Besides, the proposition to remeasure the work, was under the existing circumstances so reasonable, that no fair and just man could have objected to it. But even if there was no agreement at the time of entering into the bond, yet, on general principles, as the bond was founded on the award, and as the award itself was liable to be set aside for misconduct of the arbitrators, and is in many respects contrary to justice, the bond itself ought to be no more respected than the award. I am for affirming the decree.

452 *Coiner v. Hansbarger.

(Absent BROOKE, J.)

Bonds—Assignment—Insolvency of Obligor—Necessity for Bringing Suit against.—C. assigns to H. a bond of W. payable on demand; if the obligor is insolvent at the time of the assignment, it is not necessary that the assignee should bring suit on the bond against him, in order to entitle himself to recourse against the assignor.

Same—Same—Same—Liability.—In such case, the assignor is immediately liable to the assignee upon the contract of assignment.

Same—Same—Same—Agreement by Assignee Not to Bring Suit against Obligor—Waiver of Objection by Assignor.—A bond payable on demand is assigned by the holder to a third person: the obligor is insolvent at the time of the assignment, and so continues: the assignee forbears to bring suit against the obligor, and makes an arrangement with him, whereby he agrees to receive payment at a future day: the assignor being informed of the fact, though ignorant of the legal effect thereof to discharge him from liability, sanctions the arrangement, and promises payment of the debt to the assignee: HELD, the assignor is bound by such his promise to pay.

Assumpsit, by Hansbarger against Coiner, in the county court of Augusta. The declaration contained a special count, stating, that Coiner, being the holder of two bonds for 150 dollars each, payable on demand, executed by one White to a third person, by whom they had been assigned to Coiner, assigned the same bonds to Hansbarger for a valuable consideration, and that White had not paid the contents of the bonds to Hansbarger, but that on the contrary, he was, at the time of the assignment to Hansbarger, and yet, insolvent and unable to pay the same, so that suits against him on the bonds would not only have been unavailing, but by the direction of Coiner himself were not brought against him; by reason of which Coiner became liable to pay Hansbarger the said two sums of 150 dollars each, and being so liable assumed to pay the same to him &c. There were also two money counts; one, for money paid, laid out and expended; and the other, for money had and received. Coiner pleaded the general issue.

At the trial, the court, on the motion of Coiner's counsel, instructed the jury, that, if they should find from the evidence, that Hansbarger, without authority from 453 or consent *of Coiner, had made an arrangement with White, the obligor in the assigned bonds, whereby the payment of the money due thereon was postponed, as to part for two months, and as to the residue for four months, and that White actually paid the part he agreed to pay at the end of the two months, in such case, Coiner was discharged from his liability to Hansbarger, as assignor of the bonds; but the court left it to the jury to decide, upon the evidence, whether a direction given by Coiner to Hansbarger not to bring suit on the bonds till required by him, or any other circumstances proved in the cause, amounted to an authority or consent, on Coiner's part, to the arrangement made by Hansbarger with White.

Bonds—Assignment—Due Diligence—Waiver.—The use of due diligence by suit or otherwise, may be waived by the assignor, and the consideration paid by the assignee is a sufficient consideration to support the assignor's promise to pay, either express or implied. Walker v. Henry, 36 W. Va. 106, 14 S. E. Rep. 442, citing Coiner v. Hansbarger, 4 Leigh 452. The principal case is also cited in Foot-note to Barksdale v. Fenwick, 4 Call 492, on the question of due diligence.

See monographic note on "Bonds" appended to Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801, and monographic note on "Assignments" appended to Ragsdale v. Hagy, 9 Gratt. 409.

And then, the court, on the motion of Hansbarger's counsel, instructed the jury, 1. That if they should find, that at the time of Coiner's assignment of the bonds to Hansbarger, White the obligor was insolvent, and that nothing could have been got from him by suit, in such case, Hansbarger, the assignee, was not bound to bring a suit against the obligor, but had a right to recouse against Coiner, the assignor. 2. That if the jury should find, that White the obligor was insolvent at the date of Coiner's assignment to Hansbarger, and continued insolvent till the commencement of this action, in such case, Coiner became immediately liable upon the assignment to Hansbarger; and a subsequent arrangement, made by Hansbarger with White, whereby Hansbarger agreed that upon the payment of half the debt within two months, he would give White four months time for the balance, with which agreement White failed to comply,—did not impair Hansbarger's right to recover against Coiner, the assignor, in this action. And Coiner's counsel, thereupon, moved the court to instruct the jury, that unless they should find that the money could not have been obtained from White, either with or without suit, at the time the arrangement was made between Hansbarger and him, then that arrangement did discharge Coiner from his liability as assignor; but the court refused to give this instruction.

3. The court instructed the jury, that if they should find, that, after the arrangement made by Hansbarger with White, whereby time was given him for the payment of the debt due on his bonds, Coiner was informed of that arrangement, and sanctioned it, and promised payment of the debt to Hansbarger, in such case, though Coiner was ignorant of the legal consequences of such arrangement between the assignee and obligor, his promise of payment to Hansbarger was binding on him. To these instructions of the court, Coiner's counsel filed exceptions.

There was a verdict and judgment for Hansbarger. Coiner appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed the judgment; and then he appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant. The second instruction given by the county court to the jury was wrong. There is a plain analogy between the situation of an assignor of a bond, who is bound to make good the debt to the assignee, if it cannot be collected from the obligor, and the responsibility of a surety for his principal. It is not material, in the case of the assignor, that the obligor with whom the assignee makes a new contract, giving him time for the payment of the debt, is insolvent, any more than it is material, in the case of a surety, whether the principal, to whom the creditor by a new contract gives further time, is solvent or insolvent. In the first case, the assignor ought to be held to be absolutely discharged, by the new contract made by the assignee with the obligor, upon the same principle, that the surety is held to be discharged by the new contract made by the creditor with the principal. Norris v. Crummev, 2 Rand. 228; Hunter v. Jett, 4 Id. 104; M'Kenny v. Waller, 1 Leigh 434; M'Lemore v. Powell, 12 Wheat. 554. The third instruction of the court to the jury, was also erroneous. If, by reason of the new contract of the assignee with the obligor, giving him indulgence for the debt, without the consent of the assignor, the assignor was discharged from liability on his contract of assignment, then his promise to pay the debt himself, was a promise without any consideration to support it, and therefore not binding on him.

In the case of mercantile paper, indeed, where the holder has not used due diligence, the promise of the drawer or indorser to pay the money to the holder, made with full knowledge of the fact of negligence, has been held to preclude him from relying on such negligence, in his defence against an action on the bill or note. Goodall v. Dolley, 1 T. R. 712; Hopes v. Alder, 6 East 16, in notes; Lundie v. Robertson, 7 East 231; Stephens v. Lynch, 12 East 38; Potter v. Rayworth, 13 East 417. This, however, is not because the promise is considered binding per se, but because it is considered as an acknowledgment that due diligence has been used (such as giving due notice of dishonor) which dispenses with proof of such diligence; or as an admission, that the defendant is, in all events, the proper person to pay the debt. So, in Potter v. Rayworth, lord Ellenborough said, that the defendant's promise to pay, was evidence that he was conscious of his liability to pay the note, which must be because he had due notice of dishonor; and Bailey, J., considered the promise, either as an acknowledgment that he had due notice of the dishonor, or that without such notice, he was the proper person to pay the note, as the party for whose use it was drawn. The truth is, a very rigid measure of diligence is required of the holder of mercantile paper; and negligence, in many particulars, often not at all affecting the substantial justice of the claim, is fatal. Hence, the promise of the defendant has been taken, not as binding per se, but as a waiver of objection to negligence, or as equivalent with proof of diligence, or as dispensing with such proof. But, in the case of assignor and assignee of a bond, where no such rigid rules are prescribed for the conduct of the assignee, and where the measure of diligence required varies according to circumstances, the subsequent promise of the assignor to pay, after the assignee has by his negligence lost his recourse against him, must be held binding per se, or not at all; and binding per se it cannot be, unless it is founded on some consideration; on some legal or moral duty to pay the debt. Here, there was no consideration whatever to support the promise.

Leigh, for the appellee. The only diligence required of the assignee of a bond, in order to entitle him to recouse against the assignor, is, that he shall promptly bring and prosecute suit against the obligor; and if the obligor be insolvent at the time of the assignment, so that a suit against him would be wholly unavailing, it is unnecessary for him to bring the suit. Brown v. Ross, 6 Munf. 391. In the present case, then, immediately upon Coiner's assignment to Hansbarger of the bonds of White, who was at the time insolvent, Hansbarger's right of action against Coiner accrued. Any effort that he made afterwards, to get the money of White, without a suit, was a voluntary effort made for Coiner's benefit, which, certainly, could not exonerate him from his liability, already complete and absolute, to make good the debt. These considerations alone suffice to shew the propriety of the first and second instructions. The appellant's counsel regards the third instruction, as wholly independent of the second, and indeed, as proceeding on the supposition that the second was erroneous. Take it so. The instruction was, that if Coiner was informed of the arrangement made by Hansbarger with White, giving him indulgence for the debt, and sanctioned it, and promised payment, the promise was binding. His express sanction of the arrangement shewed, that he knew it was beneficial to himself; that it was the best, perhaps the only, method of getting any thing from the obligor, and so of preventing the necessity of recourse to him. His sanction of the arrangement made it his own; such sanction was equivalent with the giving of previous authority to Hansbarger to make it. His promise to pay the debt, was an acknowledgment, that he was conscious of his liability for it; an acknowledgment, that what had been done by Hansbarger, had been rightly done; so done as to preserve Hansbarger's recourse against him. There is, therefore, no question about the consideration to support the promise. The principle of the cases, 457 in *which the holder of a bill of exchange or note, has omitted what due diligence required, and yet a subsequent promise of the drawer or indorser to pay it, he being aware of the negligence, has been held binding on him for the debt, seems applicable, a fortiori, to the case at bar: the cases on the subject are all collected in 4 Petersd. Abr. Bills and Notes, p. 480. The only question upon the last instruction was, in truth, whether Coiner's ignorance of the legal effect of Hansbarger's proceedings (supposing the legal effect would have been to discharge him from liability as assignor) destroys the effect of his sanction of those proceedings, and of his promise to pay the debt. But this is no longer a questionable point. Bilbie v. Lumley, 2 East 469; Stevens v. Lynch, 12 East 38; Brisbane v. Dacres, 5 Taunt. 144; 1 Eng. C. L. Rep. 43; Stuart v. Lee, 2 Leigh 77; Taylor v. Chowning, 3 Leigh 654.

PER CURIAM. There is no error in the instructions of the county court to the jury. Judgment affirmed.

Administrator d. b. n.—Capacity to Sue*—Case at Bar.

*Administrators d. b. n.—Capacity to Sue.—See mon-

—The sureties of an executrix require counter security from her under the statute of wills of 1792, ch. 92, § 25, and she failing to give counter security, the court orders her to deliver the testator's estate then in her hands, consisting of slaves, to her sureties: she delivers the estate to them, and they receive the profits for several years; then the executrix dies, and there is an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of the testator: the sureties having never settled any account of their transactions while the estate was in their hands, a suit in chancery is brought by the administrator de bonis non against the sureties for an account of the profits to which the legatees of the testator are not parties. HELD, the suit well brought, the administrator, not the legatees, being entitled to demand the account of profits and the balance due thereon. Executors—Compensation—Amount—Testator directs, that his executors shall be handsomely paid out of his estate, for the trouble they shall be at in discharging that trust: it appears, that there is no extraordinary trouble in the administration: HELD, nothing shall be allowed beyond the usual commission of five per cent.

The last will and testament of John Hawkins deceased, proved and recorded in the county court of Hanover, in the year 1779, after appointing his executors, "desired that they might be handsomely paid out of his estate for the trouble they should be at in discharging that trust." His widow Mary Hawkins qualified as executrix, and William Waddy and George Dabney were her sureties in her executorial bond. At the May term of the county court 1794, the executrix having received due notice of an application to be then made to the court, by her sureties for counter security, and failing to appear, an order was made by the court, that she should deliver the estate of her testator in her hands, to the sureties, Waddy and Dabney. And, accordingly, she delivered to them, all the estate that remained unadministered, consisting of a few debts due or 459 claimed to be due to the estate and yet to be collected, and about twenty slaves; and thenceforth till December 1801, Waddy had the possession and management of the whole property, taking steps to collect the debts claimed for the estate, and receiving the profits of the slaves. His co-surety Dabney, took no part in the business. At the end of the year 1801, Mrs. Hawkins the executrix being dead, and Joseph Hawkins having taken administration de bonis non with the will annexed of the testator John Hawkins's estate, Waddy delivered him all the slaves belonging to the estate, but he rendered no account of his transactions while the estate was in his hands. Application was made to Waddy to render this account in 1809: when he admitted his duty to render it, but owing (it appeared) to ill health, he made no settlement; and shortly afterwards, he died.

*This order was made under the provision of the revised statute of wills of 1792 (1 Old Rev. Code, ch. 92, § 25; Pleasants's ed. p. 165), which was in these words: "When sureties for executors or administrators conceive themselves in danger of suffering thereby, and petition the court for relief, the court shall summon the executor or administrator, and make such order or decree thereupon, to relieve and secure the petitioners, by counter security or otherwise, as to them shall seem just and equitable." There was, at that time, no other statutory provision on the subject. The order of the county court, in the present instance, was in conformity with the usual practice of the courts under the provision above quoted.—Note in Original Edition.

In 1813, Joseph Hawkins, the administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of the testator John Hawkins, exhibited his bill, in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, against Dabney and John Waddy executor of William Waddy, praying an account of the administration of the estate by Dabney and Waddy, while it was in their hands under the order of the county court of May 1794, and a decree for the balance that should be found due thereon. And the defendants having put in their answers, by which it appears that Waddy had had the sole management of the estate, and was alone accountable for the same, the court ordered the executor of Waddy to render an account of Waddy's administration of Hawkins's estate while it was in his hands.

The commissioner reported two statements. The first, after allowing Waddy the usual commission of five per cent., shewed a balance due from his estate to that of Hawkins, of 1671 dollars, with long arrears of 460 interest; which balance *consisted, almost intirely, of the profits of the slaves while they were in Waddy's hands, from 1794 to 1801. The second statement shewed a balance of only 288 dollars; the balance being reduced to this sum, by crediting Waddy with 200 dollars, yearly, for the seven years of his agency, for his trouble in managing the estate. It appeared clearly, from the face of the accounts, that he had incurred no extraordinary trouble at all; and, in the first statement, all his expenses were credited to him, over and above the five per cent. commission therein allowed. The claim for the extraordinary compensation of 200 dollars a year, during the seven years, was founded wholly on the provision in the will of the testator Hawkins, that his executors "should be handsomely paid out of his estate for the trouble they should be at in discharging their trust."

Much delay was produced in the progress of the cause, by the deaths of all the parties, the necessity of reviving it from time to time, and the delays in the qualifications of other representatives of the deceased parties; and many years elapsed before the suit was revived between the proper parties, and brought to hearing. At the final hearing, the cause stood revived between Liddal Bowles administrator de bonis non of the testator John Hawkins, and Anthony Waddy the surviving executor of William Waddy (the surety) and Edmund Goodwin administrator of John Waddy, who alone had first qualified as the executor of William.

The chancellor, being of opinion that there was no ground for the claim of the extraordinary compensation of 200 dollars per annum to Waddy, for his trouble in managing the estate, and that the usual commission of five per cent. was an ample compensation, decreed, that the surviving executor of Waddy should pay to Bowles the administrator de bonis non &c. of Hawkins, the balance of 1671 dollars, with interest &c. appearing to be due by the first statement of the commissioner's report. From this decree, the defendant applied by petition to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

461 *Daniel and Johnson, for the appellant, insisted, 1. that Waddy, who had in effect administered the estate of Hawkins from 1794 to 1801, was entitled, by the express provision of Hawkins's will to be "handsomely paid for his trouble;" which, they said, certainly meant that he should be allowed something more than the usual compensation of five per cent. commission. And 2. that the administrator de bonis non of Hawkins, could not maintain a suit against Waddy, to recover the balance due from him to Hawkins's estate, any more than he could have maintained a bill against Mrs. Hawkins, the executrix, to recover a like balance due from her, if the estate had remained in her hands, since Waddy must be considered as acting merely as her agent; and that the claim could only be prosecuted by the creditors or the legatees of Hawkins: and as to this point, they relied on Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo, 5 Rand. 51.

J. M'C. Wickham and Leigh, for the appellee, answered, that there was not the least pretext for the claim of extraordinary compensation for Waddy's services; for it was plain, from the accounts, that if there had been any extraordinary trouble in the administration of Hawkins's estate, that trouble had been incurred by Mrs. Hawkins, the executrix, before the estate was taken out of her hands; that Waddy, certainly, had incurred no trouble for which the commission of five per cent. was not a "handsome" compensation. As to the other point, they said, that Waddy was not an executor or administrator of Hawkins's estate, nor an agent of the executrix, but only a receiver appointed by the court; per Green, J., in Wernick v. M'Murdo, 5 Rand. 87. But supposing he was to be regarded as the agent of Mrs. Hawkins, the executrix; then, as the moneys he had received had never been accounted for and paid to her, she neither had, in fact, nor could have, administered them, or converted them to her own use; so that the balance due from Waddy was assets of Hawkins's estate remaining unadministered, and unconverted, which, according to the 462 *principles of the case of Wernick's adm'r v. M'Murdo, belonged to the administrator de bonis non of Hawkins; Id. pp. 72, 73.

PER CURIAM. The decree is to be affirmed.

It is not necessary that the scire facias should shew, that the execution against the principal had been superseded for the specific thing and given for the alternative value, according to the statute 1 Rev. This was a scire facias, sued out by Cloud against the executor of Catlett, upon a recognizance of special bail entered into by Catlett in his lifetime, for one Lelew, in an action of detinue brought by Cloud against Lelew in the circuit court of Shenandoah.

The scire facias—reciting that D. Cloud, at a circuit court held for the county of Shenandoah on the 27th April 1826, by the judgments of the court, had recovered against S. E. a justice of the peace of Shenandoah, J. Catlett "personally appeared, and undertook for the said S. Lelew. that in case he should be cast in the said suit, he the said S. Lelew would restore the aforesaid property or the alternative value thereof, or pay and satisfy the condemnation of the court, or render his body in prison in execution for the same, or that he the said J. Catlett would do it for him," as appeared by the recognizance filed in the said suit; and that the said Lelew had not restored the chattels aforesaid to the said Cloud, nor paid him the aforesaid value and costs, nor rendered his body to prison, nor the said J. Catlett for him; and that the said J. Catlett, since entering into the recognizance, had died, and A. Catlett was his executor—therefore, commanded the sheriff to make known to the executor, that he should be at the clerk's office of the said circuit court, at the rules there to be held, on &c. to shew cause why Cloud should not have execution against the estate of the bail in the hands of his executor, of the said judgment, according to the form and effect of the recognizance &c.

The defendant appeared and craved oyer of the recognizance in the scire facias mentioned; which being read to him, he demurred, and the plaintiff joined in the demurrer; the entry of the demurrer, and joinder in the record, being in these words—"And the said defendant demurs generally, in which the plaintiff joins."

The recognizance set out on oyer was as follows: "Memorandum, that upon the 17th May 1824, J. Catlett, of the county &c. personally appeared before me M. E. a justice of the peace &c. and undertook for S. Lelew, at the suit of D. Cloud, in an action of detinue now depending in the circuit court of Shenandoah for certain chattels [specifying them] of the [aggregate] value of 1300 464 dollars, that, in *case the said S. Lelew shall be cast in the said suit, he the said S. Lelew will restore the aforesaid property or the alternative value thereof, or pay and satisfy the condemnation of the court, or render his body in prison in execution for the same, or that he the said J. Catlett will do it for him" &c.

The circuit court held, that the law upon the demurrer was for the defendant, and gave judgment for him; to which this court, on the petition of the plaintiff, allowed a supersedeas.

Johnson, for the plaintiff in error. The demurrer, as here pleaded, is so loose and vague, that it is impossible to understand from it the issue of law it was intended to present; the circuit court ought not to have admitted it; and this court ought not to tolerate such an irregular practice. The appellee's counsel will, doubtless, state the grounds, on which the judgment of the circuit court, that the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment upon his scire facias, is to be vindicated.

Leigh, for the defendant in error. A general demurrer, in the most technical form, would have given precisely the same information as to the point of law, as this informal pleading gave, and no more: it would merely have denied that the plaintiff was entitled, upon his own shewing, to recover; and this was denied by this informal demurrer. The plaintiff joined in it, and his objection to it, now, in this court, for want of form, comes too late. The points of law presented by the demurrer, are obvious. The statute requires, that the recognizance of special bail in detinue, shall be so changed from the form of the recognizance in other actions, "as to subject the bail to the restitution of the thing sued for, whether animate or inanimate, or the alternative value, as the court shall adjudge; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 53, 105, pp. 501, 512. The recognizance here is faulty; because after stating the alternatives which the bail undertook his principal should perform, or render his body in prison, it omitted to refer 465 the duty of the bail to the judgment *of the court, as the statute requires.

The recognizance is so framed as to bind the bail for the alternatives specified in the recognizance, not "as the court

6 Leigh 355. CARR, J., said: "I wish it distinctly understood, that I do not mean by anything said here, to detract from the case of Cloud v. Catlett's Ex'or, in the slightest degree. My best judgment approves that decision, as sound and clear law. That was a scire facias against bail, liable by his undertaking in the original action, and I think, that the scire facias was sufficiently full, and gave sufficient notice, that the distingas had been superseded, and the ca. sa. issued. I consider the case before us, essentially different."

And, in the same case, CABELL, J., said: "The omission to state, even in a scire facias at common law, what is essential to the plaintiff's recovery, is no cause of demurrer. Thus, in a scire facias against the executor of one who had been special bail in an action of detinue, to show cause why the plaintiff should not have execution of the judgment, against the estate of the bail in the hands of the executor, it was not stated, either that the distingas for the specific thing had been superseded, or that a ca. sa. against the principal had been returned non est inventus. Nobody doubted that these things were essential to the plaintiff's right to recover. But the court held, that the absence of them was not to be taken advantage of by demurrer, but must be shown by plea. (Cloud v. Catlett's Ex'or, 4 Leigh 462.)"

In this case (Catlett v. Russell), JUDGE TUCKER referred (p. 875) with approval to his opinion in the principal case.

should adjudge," but whether the court should adjudge or not. In the form of the recognizance of special bail in detinue, given in Henning's Justice, p. 137, the undertaking of the bail is, that the principal shall restore the thing, or the alternative value thereof, "as the court shall adjudge, or that the bail shall do it for him." (It ought to be, that the principal shall restore the thing, or the alternative value, as the court shall adjudge, or render his body in execution for the same, or that the bail shall do it for him.) This judgment of the court is essential to ascertain the responsibility of the bail; as is apparent from the 46th section of the statute of executions, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, p. 541, which provides, that "if a distringas issue in detinue, the court, for good cause shewn, may direct it to be superseded so far as relates to the specific thing, and to be executed for the alternative price or value only, if fixed in the judgment, or if the same shall afterwards be fixed by writ of inquiry." In truth, the body of the principal cannot be touched on a distringas; it is not till that is superseded, and the judgment is thus made one for the alternative value, that a ca. sa. may be sued out upon it; and until that is done, therefore, the principal cannot render his body in execution, or the bail do it for him; because the principal cannot, at his own pleasure, discharge himself of the duty of restoring the specific chattel recovered, nor is it in the power of the bail to exempt him from it. To fix the liability of the bail in detinue, then, it is essential the court should adjudge, that the distringas be superseded for the specific thing, and thus make the judgment a mere judgment for the alternative value, like any other debt; a judgment on which a ca. sa. may be sued out; and then the ca. sa. must be sued out against the principal without effect, before a scire facias can be maintained against the bail. Special bail can never be charged, in any case, till a ca. sa. against the principal has been returned non est inventus; 1 Bac

466 *Abr. Bail in civil causes, D. 341, for the bail is not bound to render the principal, until he knows by the plaintiff's suing out the writ of ca. sa. that he means to proceed against the person of defendant; 2 Wms. Saund. 72 a, in notes. Therefore, even supposing that the objection to the form of the recognizance, in this case, can be got over, the scire facias is fatally defective; for it does not shew (what it is essential to the plaintiff's right to recover, it should shew) that the distringas had been superseded for the specific thing, and the judgment made a mere judgment for the alternative value, so as to give the plaintiff a right to sue out a ca. sa. without which the bail cannot surrender the body of the principal in discharge of his undertaking. The bail rightly demurred to the scire facias, because it did not shew any right in the plaintiff to proceed against him, much more any title to recover. It was not necessary to allege by plea, the omission of proceedings necessary to fix his liability, when the plaintiff did not allege that such proceedings had been had.

It behooved the plaintiff to shew in his pleadings, a title to recover.

Johnson, in reply. When the statute requires, that the recognizance of special bail in detinue, shall be so changed as to subject the bail to the restitution of the thing sued for, or the alternative value, as the court shall adjudge, it is obvious, that the judgment of the court intended by the provision, is the judgment for the specific thing or the value, in the alternative, not the subsequent order superseding the distringas for the specific thing. The bail must, therefore, discharge himself, if the principal do not discharge him, by restoring the specific thing, or the alternative value ascertained by the judgment. But, admitting it to be necessary, that the court should supersede the distringas for the specific thing, and that a ca. sa. should be sued out against the principal without effect, in order to fix the liability of the bail, yet it is not necessary, that the scire facias against the bail should allege that such proceedings have been had. In cases of judgments for 467 debt, the plaintiff *must sue out a ca. sa. against the principal, and that must be returned non est inventus, before he can maintain a scire facias against the bail; and yet the scire facias never alleges that such proceedings have been had. If they have not been had, the bail must plead that matter in bar. He cannot demur to the scire facias, for the omission to allege the preliminary proceedings against the principal.

CARR, J. This demurrer is so loosely pleaded, that I feel some unwillingness to tolerate it. It is, simply, that the defendant demurred generally, without saying whether to the scire facias or the recognizance of bail. It may be presumed that it is to the recognizance; for, if the purpose were not to object to it, there could have been no reason for demanding oyer of it. Accordingly, the counsel in support of the demurrer, made his first attack upon the recognizance; though he did also take the position, that the scire facias was defective in not stating that the distringas had been superseded for the specific thing, and the ca. sa. issued.

With respect to the recognizance, I cannot see any substantial defect in it. I have examined the subject with my best care, and looked into the scanty materials which the books furnish us on the subject of detinue, and the proceedings in it; but they give me no light. Our statutes must guide us, together with the reason of the case, and the analogies of the law. In actions of debt &c. where bail is required, the undertaking of bail is, that if the principal be cast, the principal will pay and satisfy the condemnation of the court, or render his body to prison in execution for the same, or that the bail will do it for him. Upon this undertaking, the bail is never considered as fixed for the debt, unless the debtor has failed both to pay and to render his body; and to prove that he has failed, there must be a ca. sa. issued without effect, before the scire facias can issue against the bail. In actions of detinue, the statute directs that the recognizance shall be so changed, as to subject the bail, to the native value, as the court may adjudge. With respect to these words, as the court may adjudge, it seems to me that they refer to the alternative value; meaning, that the bail shall be subjected to the restitution of the specific thing, or the alternative value, as fixed in the judgment of the court. This idea is founded, in some degree, on a clause of the execution law, which being in pari materia, may be taken as a part of the same statute: "if a distringas issue in detinue, the court, for good cause shewn, may direct it to be superseded, so far as it relates to the specific thing, and to be executed for the alternative price or value only, if fixed in the judgment, or if the same shall afterwards be fixed by a writ of inquiry." It strikes me, that the judgment of the court, in these two passages, relates to the same thing. By the words as the court may adjudge, the law cannot mean, that the bail shall restore the thing, or pay the value, as the court may adjudge that he shall do the one or the other; for we know that the court has no such power. I do not, however, consider these words as having much bearing on the questions involved. The bail, in detinue, undertakes that the defendant shall restore the specific thing, or pay the condemnation of the court, or render his body to prison in execution for the same, or that he will do it for him. If the principal does either of these things, the bail is discharged; if he does neither, the bail is liable. Now, I think, that a careful examination of this recognizance will satisfy any one, that the bail is substantially bound, according to the requisitions of the law; that the doing of either of these three things by the principal, will release him, and that he can only be rendered liable by his doing none of the three. Neither the alternative value, nor the render of the body, can be demanded till the distringas is superseded; nor can there be a failure in the render, till a ca. sa. (as in all other cases) has issued ineffectually.

With some of my brethren, the chief difficulty in the case, seems to be the failure in the scire facias to allege, 469 *that the court had superseded the distringas, and awarded the ca. sa. I cannot think this was necessary. To my mind the scire facias sets out the record of the judgment with sufficient fullness; and if the fact were, that there had been no supersedeas of the distringas, and award of other executions, this should have been shewn by plea.

Examine the scire facias:—after stating the judgment with all its particulars, and undertaking of the bail, the writ states, that Lehw, the principal, had not restored the chattels to Cloud, the plaintiff, nor paid the alternative values thereof and the costs, nor surrendered his body to prison, nor Catlett for him. Are not these allegations, in this judicial writ, founded upon the express ground, that the supersedeas and ca. sa. have been awarded? How could the principal be said to have failed to pay the condemnation, or deliver his body in execution, if there had been no ca. sa.? and how could the bail be said to have forfeited his recognizance by not doing it for him, until a ca. sa.? And when he is called on to shew cause why Cloud should not have execution against him of the judgment aforesaid according to the form and effect of the recognizance, can he fail to understand, that this takes for granted the superseding the distringas, and issuing the ca. sa.? Is it not a fair call on him to plead the want of these prerequisites to charge him, if the fact would support him? What is this superseding order of court? Is it a judgment? surely not: such an idea supposes two judgments for the same thing in the same cause. For, in the original proceeding, the verdict was for the chattels if to be had, if not then their alternative value; and the judgment of the court followed it exactly. The order, then, was no judgment; there was nothing to be adjudged; but the court, upon the motion of the plaintiff, without notice even, being informed, that their process of distringas was ineffectual, superseded it, and opened to the plaintiff the common law process of execution. Was this ever denied?

is it not a motion of course? Look at 470 *the effect of the distringas: it commands the sheriff to distrain the defendant by his goods and chattels, lands and tenements, so that neither he nor any persons by his authority, may lay hands on them; and the sheriff takes house, lands, and goods, and receives the issues and profits, until the defendant produce the specific thing of the value of so much, or the value if the thing is not to be had; and when the defendant in contempt, stands out against the severe and rigorous process, and frustrates the judgment of the court, and the justice of the case, can it be supposed, that the court would hesitate, at the motion of the plaintiff, whose sole concern it is, to award him the other executions, which issue in the commonest cases? Assuredly, not. As far as my experience goes, the plaintiff in such case has only to shew, that the distringas has been ineffectual, and that he wishes it superseded; it is done of course. And why need this be stated in the scire facias, more than any other motion made in a cause? Why more than to state in every scire facias against bail, that a ca. sa. has issued? In no case, can you come upon the bail by scire facias, unless you have issued a ca. sa. without effect, by which the bail has had notice, that the body is demanded. And if you omit this, the bail may defeat the scire facias, but not by demurrer. Thus in Williams v. Vaughan, Cro. Jac. 97, Moor 775, Williams brought scire facias against Vaughan, who was bail for Gouch, in debt; and set forth the judgment, and that Gouch had not rendered his body, nor paid the condemnation; Vaughan demurred, because it was not alleged that a ca. sa. issued first against the principal; sed non allocatur. And I rather think, that, since that time, it has not been attempted, at least I have met with no later attempt.

I think the scire facias good, and am for reversing the judgment, and awarding execution for the alternative value.

CABELL, J., concurred.

471 *TUCKER, P. I do not think there is any defect in the recognizance; but I am of opinion that the scire facias is defective.

It seems to be agreed, on all hands, that the bail is only to be responsible upon the failure of the principal to perform the whole of the alternatives mentioned in the recognizance. One of them is to render his body to prison in execution for the alternative value, not for the specific thing, for that is only to be obtained by distringas. The failure to perform this requisition, can only be ascertained by the return of a ca. sa. non est inventus, as some of the books say; or, as it is said in others, the issue and return is necessary to notify the bail that the plaintiff designs to proceed against him; but all agree that the ca. sa. is essential to sustain the scire facias.

In setting forth his right of action in the scire facias, the plaintiff must, as in every other case, shew his title to a judgment. It is true, that in the scire facias it is not necessary to set forth the issue and return of the ca. sa. for the want of it is a matter that must come out in the defendant's plea. Yet the scire facias must, in every case, shew a title to the thing for which the plaintiff demands judgment, even supposing a ca. sa. has properly issued. In the action of debt, he shews a judgment for a sum certain, and he demands a judgment against the bail for that sum, which the bail was bound to pay him. But in detinue, the judgment is for the property, not for the price. From an examination of the old books of entries, I find, that the judgment, when by default or on demurrer, was formerly entered in the first instance, for the specific thing; and upon the return that it could not be had, but not till then, a writ of inquiry of the value was awarded, and a second judgment was entered for the alternative value. Coke's Entries 169b; 3 Blacks. Com. 413. This may possibly have given rise to the phrase in our statute, "as the court shall adjudge," so much commented on at the bar. But where an issue is made up between the parties, the jury who 472 try the issue, find *the value, and judgment is entered for the specific thing or for the alternative value if it cannot be had. Upon this judgment a distringas issues, and upon that distringas, the sheriff is only entitled to receive the specific thing. He cannot receive the alternative value though tendered by the defendant, without a previous direction of the court that the distringas shall be superseded for the specific thing. Nor can the plaintiff direct him to levy for the alternative value, without a like direction. Neither party, therefore, can change the character of the judgment without the order or judgment of the court. This order, superseding the distringas for the specific thing, and directing it to be executed for the alternative value, is in strict analogy to the second judgment I have mentioned. And the provision requiring an order of the court for the conversion of the judgment for the specific thing into a judgment for the value—in other words, converting the action, in effect, from detinue to trover—is most wisely given. For the propriety of superseding the distringas for the specific thing, may depend upon various circumstances. One effect of the order is to change the property; to vest the specific thing in the defendant, and a right to its value in the plaintiff. Now, if the property is eloiigned, or has been sold by the defendant, the order is most proper. But, if the slave be dead since the judgment, there would seem to be little reason in compelling the defendant to pay the value: certain it is, this court has been divided on the question on whom the loss would fall, in case of death of the slave before verdict; Austin's ex'or v. Jones, Gilm. 341. Be this as it may, it would certainly be inconsistent with every received principle to permit the defendant to keep the property against the will of the plaintiff, if the value found by the jury was inadequate, or to permit the plaintiff to waive the claim to the property itself, and take the alternative value, if that value was enhanced. Until such an order of court can be shewn, the plaintiff should not have, and certainly has not, any money demand against the defendant.

473 *Now, it seems to me, that as the scire facias calls upon the bail to shew cause why judgment shall not be rendered against him, which judgment can only be for money, it should appear on the face of the process itself, that an order had been made superseding the distringas for the specific thing, and directing it to be executed for the alternative value only. For how, in case of default, can the court see a justification for a judgment for the value? Or how, if this demurrer were overruled, can this court see that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for it? It may be said, that as there is no defence, it will be implied, in like manner, as the issue and return of the ca. sa. will, in such case, be implied. But to this the answer is obvious; that though the court may well imply an act of the party, namely, the issuing of the ca. sa. it cannot properly imply an act of the court. It could not, for instance, imply the original judgment of the court. The party must shew that judgment, as the foundation of his demand. But the order to supersede the distringas, is itself a judgment. It is the decision of the court upon a judicial question submitted to it, which, as has been shewn, completely changes the rights of the parties. Again; though the court, upon default of the defendant, may imply, and does imply, the act of issuing a ca. sa. yet I do not think the right to issue it can be left to implication. The scire facias must shew a right to take the body, before the bail can be charged for an omission to render it in execution: for, although the undertaking is that the defendant shall do some one or other of several things, yet, after all, the bail cannot be responsible until there has been a failure in all, and the last of them is the surrender of the body.

I have diligently searched the books of entries for the forms of scire facias against bail in detinue, but in vain. I have not been fortunate enough to find even a recognizance of bail in that action. I have been, therefore, compelled to examine the question upon the reason of the thing and the analogies of the law; and upon the scire facias is defective, and that the judgment should be affirmed.*

Rice v. White.

April, 1838.

Deceit—Statute of Limitations—When It Begins to Run.—In an action for deceit in a sale of a chattel, there is a plea of the statute of limitations, a general replication thereto, and issue thereon joined: HELD, the cause of action accrued at the time of the deceit practised, and the limitation begins to run immediately.

Same—Same—Same—Quære—Special Replication.—It seems, that if the fraud was not discovered till some time after it was practised and within the time of limitation, this would suffice to take the case out of the statute: but to enable the plaintiff to avail himself of such matter, he must plead it specially in his replication.

Same—Measure of Damages.—Quære, in an action for deceit in the sale of a slave, by vendee against vendor, what is the proper measure of damages? the purchase money with interest, or the value at the time the property was recovered from the vendee for defect in the vendor's title?

*Note by the president. I think, that after the recital of the original judgment, concluding thus, "whereof the said S. Lebew was convict as appears of record," the scire facias should have proceeded to recite something after this form—"And whereas afterwards, to wit, on the — day of —, at a circuit court continued and held for the said county, it was by the judgment of the said court, on the motion of the said D. Cloud, ordered that the distringas be superseded as to the specific thing recovered by the said judgment, and that the same be executed for the alternative price or value; and whereas, afterwards, to wit, on the — day of —, at a circuit court continued and held for the said county, it appearing to the court, that the distringas theretofore awarded the plaintiff was unavailing, upon the motion of the plaintiff, it was ordered, that he have execution against the said S. Lebew, as well for the alternative value of the said property as for his damages and costs adjudged to him as aforesaid."

Deceit—Statute of Limitations—When It Begins to Run.—To the point that the right of action for deceit occurs at the time the deceit is practiced, and the statute of limitations begins to run at once, the principal case is cited in Merchants' National Bank v. Spates, 41 W. Va. 32, 23 S. E. Rep. 682; Fant v. Fant, 17 Gratt. 14.

In Thompson v. Whitaker Iron Co., 41 W. Va. 574, 23 S. E. Rep. 795, it was held that where a cause of action arises out of fraud the statute of limitations runs from its perpetration; but that this rule did not apply to fraudulent transfers. In delivering the opinion of the court, BRANNON, J., said: "Callis v. Waddy, 2 Munf. 511. Rice v. White, 4 Leigh 474. Cook v. Darby, 4 Munf. 444. and Fant v. Fant, 17 Gratt. 14, say that statute runs from the act of fraud."

In Rowe v. Bentley, 29 Gratt. 700, it is said: "In the cases of fraud the authorities are conflicting, as to whether at law the statute begins to run from the commission of the fraud, or from its discovery. Angell on Lim. § 183 to § 189; Callis v. Waddy, 2 Munf. 511; Rice v. White, 4 Leigh 474; 1 Rob. Prac. (Old Ed.) pp. 82, 87, 110. In equity, however, it would seem to be well settled that the statute begins to run only from the discovery of the fraud. Shields, Adm'r, etc., of Waller & others v. Anderson, Adm'r of Byrd, etc., 3 Leigh 729; 2 Rob. Prac. (Old Ed.) 261, 252."

See the principal case also cited in Scates v. Wilson, 9 Leigh 477; Huston v. Cantrell, 11 Leigh 160; Thornburg v. Bowen, 37 W. Va. 548, 16 S. E. Rep. 828.

See further, monographic note on "Limitation of Actions" appended to Herrington v. Harkins, 1 Rob. 591.

Statute of Limitations—Exception—Special Replication.—If there is anything that takes a case out of the statute of limitations, it can only be availed of by stating it in a replication to the plea of the statute. To th's effect, the principal case is cited in Merchants' National Bank v. Spates, 41 W. Va. 33, 23 S. E. Rep. 683; Davis v. McMullen, 86 Va. 267, 9 S. E. Rep. 1095; Vanbibber v. Beirne, 8 W. Va. 178. See Boyle v. Conway, 3 Call 1, and foot-note.

Same—Measure of Damages.—In case for deceit there is, perhaps, no fixed rule for the assessment of damages: they are not limited, however, as in an action on the warranty: if so, they may go beyond those recoverable in an action on the warranty. Boyles v. Overby, 11 Gratt. 205, citing the principal case and Brown v. Shields, 41 Ark 446.

This was an action on the case for deceit in the sale of a slave, brought by White against Rice, in April 1826, in the circuit court of Halifax. The declaration contained several counts: those on which the 475 plaintiff relied at the trial, *alleged, in substance, that Rice, professing to act as the agent of one Ann Foster, and by authority from her, in making sale of a female slave, and knowing that Mrs. Foster had only a life interest in the slave, and that the reversion after her death belonged to the executor of one Matthew Rice deceased, falsely and fraudulently represented and warranted to White, that Mrs. Foster, was entitled to the absolute property in the slave, and by means of that deceit, sold the same to White, at a full price for the absolute property; and the executor of M. Rice, afterwards in an action against one Lewellen, to whom White had sold the slave, recovered the same; and so by means of the deceit practised on him by the defendant Rice, whereby he was induced to give a full price for the absolute property of the slave, White not only lost the property, but was compelled to incur great expense in defending the title &c.

The defendant pleaded two pleas in bar, the entry whereof in the record, and of the issues thereon, was in these words: "And the defendant by his attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when &c. and for plea saith, that he is not guilty in manner and form as the plaintiff against him hath complained; and the defendant for further plea, pleads the statute of limitations; and of this he puts himself upon the country; and the plaintiff likewise.

At the trial of the issues, several bills of exceptions were filed by the defendant's counsel to opinions of the court; but it is not necessary to state them, as none of the points thereby presented were noticed in the argument here, or touched by the court, in its decision of the cause.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff on both issues, and assessed his damages to 459 dollars.

Whereupon the defendant moved the court to set aside the verdict, and direct a new trial, 1. because the verdict was not warranted by the evidence; 2. because the jury had given excessive damages; and 3. because the action in point of law could not be maintained against the defendant. The judge, at his instance, certified, that the following facts were proved at the trial, viz:

476 That Rice, the defendant, in the year 1811, as the agent of his mother, Ann Foster, sold the slave in question to the plaintiff, White, for 220 dollars; and part of the purchase money was applied to the discharge of a debt then due by Mrs. Foster, and the balance to a debt due by the defendant himself, to the plaintiff; that, at the time of this sale, the defendant knew that Mrs. Foster had only a life interest in the slave, and that the reversion belonged to the executor of M. Rice deceased, Mrs. Foster's first husband and the defendant's father; and he did not disclose these facts to the plaintiff: that Mrs. Foster died in 1817; and then the executor of M. Rice brought an action of detinue against Mary Lewellen, to whom the plaintiff had in the meantime sold the slave, and recovered judgment against her for the slave or the alternative value thereof, and damages for the detention; which value was ascertained by the jury to be —, and the damages for the detention were assessed at —: that Mrs. Lewellen then brought suit against the plaintiff, to recover of him retribution, of what had been recovered of her by Rice's executor; and in that action recovered a judgment, and sued out execution for the damages and costs adjudged to her, amounting to the sum of 459 dollars [which was the amount of damages assessed to White, by the verdict of the jury in this suit]; but the defendant insisted, that, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover in this action at all, the measure of damages should be the purchase money paid by the plaintiff for the slave, with interest thereon from the time the right of action for her accrued to M. Rice's executor. Upon this state of facts, the defendant's counsel moved for a new trial, on the grounds above mentioned. The court overruled the motion, and the defendant excepted.

Judgment was then given for the plaintiff, for the damages assessed by the jury and costs; from which the defendant appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Johnson for the appellant, and Leigh for the appellee.

I. Johnson insisted, that the proper measure of damages was the purchase money, with interest from the time when the action of Rice's executor for the slave sold to White accrued. And Leigh, earnestly contended, that the actual amount of damages, which the purchaser sustained by reason of the defect of the title, and the deceit practised upon him in regard thereto, was the just measure of retribution due to him, which was ascertained, in this case, by Mrs. Lewellen's recovery against him. Otherwise, he said, no one could ever safely purchase a female slave; for, if she should have increase, she would herself be of little profit to her owner, and the children would be a charge during their childhood; and then, the mother and all her increase might be recovered of the vendee, and he, after being at the charge of rearing the children, would only get back the purchase money he had paid for the mother. But this point, though very fully debated at the bar, was not noticed by the judges, in their opinions.

II. Johnson maintained, that upon the state of facts proved at the trial, as certified by the judge, the verdict ought to have been for the defendant upon the issue joined on the plea of the statute of limitations. He said, the deceit practised by Rice in the sale of the slave to White, was the only cause of action, which White could have against Rice; and the action for the deceit accrued immediately upon the sale, which was in 1811; but this action was not brought till April 1826. He cited Batley v. Faulkner, 3 Barn. & Ald. 288; Short v. M'Carthy, Id. 626; 5 Eng. C. L. R. 478 288, 403; Granger v. George*, 5 Barn. & Cress. 149; Howell v. Young, Id. 259; 11 Eng. C. L. R. 185, 219; Bank of Utica v. Childs, 6 Cowan 238; Miller v. Adams, 16 Mass. Rep. 456; Wilcox v. Plummer, 4 Peters 172.

Leigh said, that the fraud was sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations; Bree v. Holbech, 2 Doug. 656. That, in this action for deceit, the cause of action accrued when the deceit was discovered; for the effect of the deceit was not only to defraud the party injured, but to conceal the fraud from him; and to give the wrongdoer the benefit of the statute of limitations, during the time the injured party was lulled into security by the very deceit practised upon him, was, in effect, to allow him to derive from his own wrong, all the advantage he could have derived from perfect fairness in the transaction; it would exempt him from responsibility for the deceit, unless, by chance, it should be discovered before the time of limitation should expire. Clarke v. Hougham, 2 Barn. & Cress. 149; 9 Eng. C. L. R. 47; Brown v. Howard, 2 Brod. & Bing. 73; 6 Eng. C. L. R. 25; The first Massachusetts Turnpike v. Field, 3 Mass. Rep. 201; Sherwood v. Sutton, 5 Mason 143. It might be said, that, if the action for the deceit accrued when it was discovered, yet the fact of the deceit being discovered within the time of limitation, ought to be put in issue by a replication in avoidance of the plea of the statute; and this, as a general proposition, might be true: but, in this case, the statute of limitations was not formally pleaded, and the same regularity of pleading on the plaintiff's part, ought not to be required of him, as if the defendant's pleading had been regular. It was the design of both parties to dispense with form, and to put in issue the whole merits of the defence founded on the statute of limitations. The defendant pleaded "the statute of limitations," without saying how the statute operated as a bar, and tendered an issue; and the plaintiff, without saying how his action was within the time, accepted the issue. The pleadings left both parties (and were intended to leave them both) at large, to shew when the action accrued.

479 *Johnson replied, that the defendant's plea of "the statute of limitations," though irregular, was as good after issue taken upon it, as if it had been ever so formal and technical; and the authorities cited for the appellee shew that the matter of avoidance now relied on in argument, ought to have been pleaded in a replication, in order that it might have been put in issue, or demurred to. But it was questionable, to say the least, whether the fact of the deceit having come to the knowledge of the plaintiff within the time of limitation, would have sufficed to avoid the operation of the statute; Callis v. Waddy, 2 Munf. 511; Troup v. Smith, 2 Johns. Rep. 33; Leonard v. Pitney, 5 Wend. 30.

*This bill of exceptions did not state the date of the institution of the suit of Rice's executor against Mrs. Lewellen, nor the date of his judgment against her, nor the alternative value of the slave ascertained by that judgment, nor the damages assessed for the detention; and these facts appear no where in the record. Neither did this bill of exceptions state the date of the institution of Mrs. Lewellen's suit, or of her judgment against White: but it appeared from the record of that suit, set out in another bill of exceptions filed at the trial, that it was commenced in February 1826, and the judgment recovered in November following. This suit of White v. Rice was commenced in April 1826.—Note in Original Edition.

CARR, J. The counsel for the appellant, in the argument, confined himself to the bill of exceptions taken to the refusal of the court to grant a new trial, which contains a statement of the facts proved at the trial, certified by the judge.

The suit was brought in 1826. The declaration charged fraud and deceit practised by the defendant on the plaintiff, in the sale of a female slave in 1811. The pleas were not guilty, and "the statute of limitations;" on both which issue was directly taken.

It was contended, by the appellant's counsel, that the evidence shewed a case, which, on the plea of the statute, proved the verdict to be against both law and evidence; and, consequently, that the court erred in not granting a new trial. I was exceedingly struck with the argument of the appellee's counsel in reply, and was strongly inclined to believe with him, that the statute could not run in such a case till the fraud was discovered. But an examination of the cases has compelled me to think, that, in the actual state of the pleadings, the decision refusing the new trial was wrong. The statute says, "the action shall be brought within five years next after the cause of such action or suit and not after." The question then is, when did the action accrue? It seems to me, 480 when *the fraud in the sale was perpetrated. Suppose, that in a month after he had received the slave, and paid his purchase money, the plaintiff had discovered the cheat; could he not instantly have brought suit for it? What should prevent him? Could the defendant ward off the action by pleading that the plaintiff had received no injury, and possibly never might? surely, not: the injury was in the fraud; in selling him a slave out and out, to which he knew his mother had no title longer than her life. This doctrine is held, explicitly, in many cases cited at the bar. I do not undertake to decide, how the question would have been, if to the plea of the statute, the plaintiff had replied, that the defendant had fraudulently and deceitfully concealed from him the cheat he had practised upon him; and that the suit was brought within five years after the discovery. In that case, there must have been either a demurrer, which would confess the fact, and put the case upon the law; or an issue, and then the fact would be directly in issue. But here, the issue is different; it is taken directly upon the statute; that is, upon the question, whether the suit was brought within five years after the cause of action arose. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the cause sent back for a new trial, when the plaintiff may move to amend his pleadings, if he shall be so advised.

CABELL and BROOKE, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. Our first attention, in this case, must be turned to the state of the pleadings. (He stated them.) Upon the trial of the issues a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff upon which the defendant moved for a new trial.

If the plea of the defendant be an immaterial plea, it is obvious, that no new trial ought to be granted; for it would be vain and futile to award a new trial for an immaterial matter; of a matter which, even if found for the defendant, could not entitle him to a judgment. But here, the plea of "the statute of limitations," only

481 seems to be an informal, *and not an immaterial plea. If pleaded formally, it would be a bar; and, accordingly, we find it was so considered in Cook v. Darby, 4 Munf. 444. That was trespass on the case against a common carrier for embezzlement; pleas, not guilty and "the act of limitations" in those words only, and issue: the plaintiff's evidence proved embezzlement fifteen years before the action: the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that the statute of limitations barred the action; but the court instructed the jury, that the statute did not apply: exceptions were taken, and a supersedeas allowed by this court. The appellee's counsel contended, that the statute did not apply to the case, as the declaration charged a fraud: but the court, nemine dissentiente, reversed the judgment, on the express ground that the statute well applied to the case. Now, this could not have been, if the court had not considered the plea, as pleaded, a material and substantial plea, however informal. It was expressly assailed as being defective, and was likened to the plea of "justification," which it is admitted is not good; Kirtley v. Deck, 3 Hen. & Munf. 388. But the objection did not prevail; the distinction, indeed, being evident, between the plea of "the statute of limitations," which offers a distinct and specific ground of defence, without anything more, and the plea of "justification," which unless carried out, is utterly nugatory. The first gives the plaintiff fair and full notice of the defence set up; whereas the second subverts no purpose of pleading, as it does not give notice of the character of the "justification," on which the defendant will rely. Kerr v. Dixon, 2 Call 319. It is true, that in the case of Henderson v. Foote's ex'ors, 3 Call 248, the court seemed to think, that the plea of non assumpsit within five years, referred to the time of the plea, according to the decision of Smith v. Walker, 1 Wash. 135, and that it was, therefore, an immaterial plea; but as, in every case, it is now held to be the settled rule that "actio non" goes to the commencement of the action, the plea ought certainly not to have been gratuitously considered as violat-

482 ing this *rule. If the short minute of the plea is to be considered as sufficient after verdict, it is because the court will intend it to be carried out into proper form. It certainly would not intend it to be extended into an improper form, unless its terms required it. This case, therefore, must yield to the case of Cook v. Darby; and the rather, as it does not seem to have been much considered, nor was the point essential to be decided.

Taking the plea as substantially good, there is no doubt that it was fully sustained by the evidence. For, in an action of deceit in the sale of property, the cause of action arises at the instant; and the plaintiff might, in this case, have sued the next day after the perpetration of the fraud, and have recovered his damages to the value of the purchase money paid. The numerous authorities cited at the bar to this point, are satisfactory and conclusive: I shall only mention, particularly, Battle v. Faulkner, Short v. M'Carthy, and Howell v. Young. In this last case Holroyd, J., says, "whether the plaintiff elects to sue in one form of action or another [either for a breach of promise, or for a breach of duty] the cause of action, which in either form is substantially the same, accrued at the same moment of time: and the breach of promise, or of duty, took place as soon as the defendant took insufficient security." In the case before us, therefore, the plaintiff might have brought his action the day after the sale, and recovered damages, if he had then known of the defect of title and the fraud practised on him.

But it is said, he did not know it; that it does not appear that the fraud was discovered more than five years before the suit brought; and that, therefore, the bar of the statute does not apply. Had the plaintiff replied that matter, I should have been unwilling to disturb the verdict on the ground of the statute. But he has not done so. He has joined issue on the plea, instead of replying the matter which would have avoided it. He cannot, therefore, avail himself of this matter in avoidance of the statute. He ought to 483 *have replied it, that the defendant might have taken issue on the fact of discovery. Non constat but that the defendant might, if he had been called upon to do so by such a replication, have proved the knowledge on the part of the plaintiff, of the defect of title, on the next day after the sale. On general principles, it is as necessary that the defendant should be informed by the replication of the particular avoidance of the statute, in order that he may rebut it, as that the plaintiff should be informed of the ground of defence by plea, that he may be prepared to meet it. Nothing is more clear than that exceptions to the statute must always be replied, or any other matter which avoids its influence. Bogle v. Conway's ex'ors, 3 Call 1. In Clark v. Hougham, 2 Barn. & Cress. 149, the plea was non assumpsit within six years; replication, that the defendant did assume within six years. Bailey, J., said, in reference to certain evidence given in the case, "The question how far fraud may prevent the operation of the statute of limitations, does not properly arise in this case. On the form of the replication adopted, the only question is, when did the cause of action accrue? In order to take advantage of the fraud, there should have been a special replication." And of the same opinion were the other judges.

I am therefore of opinion, that the statute was a good bar to the action, and was sustained by the evidence. The verdict being, then, against the evidence, should be set aside, and a new trial awarded. When the verdict is set aside, the plaintiff may have leave to withdraw his informal replication, and reply that the fraud was discovered within five years before the commencement of the action, which would be, I think, a sufficient answer to the plea. Bree v. Holbech, 2 Doug. 632; Booth v. Earl of Warrington, 4 Bro. P. C.; Tomlin's edi. 163.

May, 1833.

Landlord and Tenant—Eviction by Landlord from Part of Demised Premises—Effect.—In assumpsit for the use and occupation of a farm for a year, it appears, that the landlord entered on a meadow parcel of the premises, within the year, and mowed and carried away the hay, without the consent and against the will of the tenant: who, nevertheless, continued to occupy the farm during the residue of the year: HELD, the landlord by such disturbance of the tenant, lost the benefit of the entire contract, and is not entitled to recover any part of the rent.

Assumpsit for use and occupation of land, brought by Briggs against Hall, in the county court of Fauquier. There were two

*This case, as the reporter is informed, had been compromised between the parties, before the hearing of it in this court.—Note in Original Edition.

Landlord and Tenant—Eviction of Tenant—Effect.—"The quiet enjoyment of the premises, without any molestation on the part of the landlord, is an implied condition, on which the tenant is bound to pay rent." "If, therefore, the tenant be at any time deprived of the premises by the landlord's agency, the obligation to pay rent ceases, because his obligation has force only from the consideration which is the enjoyment of the premises. From this principle it also follows, that if the land be recovered by a third person, by a title superior to that of the lessor, the tenant is discharged from the payment of rent, after eviction by such recovery. If part only of the land is recovered, such an eviction is a discharge of so much of the rent as is in proportion to the value of the land evicted. But if the lessor himself wrongfully deprives the tenant of the whole or any part of the premises, the tenant is discharged from the payment of the whole rent until the possession is restored. And the reason why there should be no apportionment of the rent in the latter case is, that it is done by the wrongful act of the landlord himself, and no man should be encouraged to disturb a tenant in the possession of that which, by the policy of the feudal law, he ought to protect and defend." In Tunis v. Grandy, 22 Gratt. 150, MONCURE, P., who delivered the opinion of the court, quotes the above principles of law in regard to the eviction of a tenant from the demised premises or a part thereof, from Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, § 378, and continues by saying: "These principles, which seem to have had their origin, in part at least, in the feudal law, are well settled, not only in England, but in many, if not most of the states of this Union, and have certainly received the emphatic sanction of this court in Briggs v. Hall, 4 Leigh 483. See also, monographic note on "Landlord and Tenant" appended to Mason v. Movers, 2 Rob. 606.

Same.—Actual Eviction—What Constitutes.—An actual eviction is an actual expulsion of the tenant out of all or some part of the demised premises,—and physical ouster or dispossession from the very thing granted, or some substantial part thereof. To this point the principal case was cited in Knotts v. McGregor, 47 W. Va. 566, 35 S. E. Rep. 901.

Appellate Practice—Demurrer to Evidence—Motion for New Trial.—In N. & W. R. Co. v. Dunnaway, 93 Va. 33, 24 S. E. Rep. 698, the principal case was cited as a case in which the appellate court reviewed a judgment on a demurrer to evidence, though no motion for a new trial was made in the court below.

For further information on this subject, see monographic note on "New Trials" appended to Boswell v. Jones, 1 Wash. 322; monographic note on "Demurrer to the Evidence" appended to Tutt v. Slaughter, 5 Gratt. 864.

counts in the declaration; namely, general indebitatus assumpsit for the use and occupation, and quantum meruit for the same. Plea, non assumpsit.

At the trial, there was a demurrer to evidence, from which it appeared, that the plaintiff adduced evidence, proving that he had let the premises, being a messuage and farm, to the defendant for a year, at a rent of 70 dollars, and that the defendant had occupied the same, accordingly, for the whole year. Then the defendant, on his part, adduced evidence, proving that there were four acres of meadow parcel of the farm let by the plaintiff to him, and that the plaintiff, during the year, entered upon the premises, and mowed the hay growing on the meadow, and carried the same away, the defendant objecting and forbidding him to do so; and this was the only interruption or disturbance given by the landlord to the tenant, who did not, thereupon, quit the premises, but continued, notwithstanding such interruption, to occupy the farm for the year. And such being the evidence on both sides, the plaintiff demurred and said that the evidence was sufficient to maintain the issue on his part, and not sufficient to maintain the same on the defendant's part; and the defendant joined in the demurrer.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 70 dollars with interest &c. subject to the opinion of the court on the demurrer to evidence. The court held that the law on the demurrer was for the defendant, 485 and gave him judgment; *and upon a supersedeas awarded to the plaintiff, the judgment was affirmed by the circuit court; and then, on the petition of the plaintiff, a supersedeas was allowed him by this court.

Stanard and Briggs, for the plaintiff in error.

Harrison for the defendant.

CARR, J. In adjudging that the evidence was sufficient in law to maintain the defendant's plea of non assumpsit, the court, no doubt, went upon the ground, that the entry and mowing and carrying away the hay crop, was an eviction as to the meadow, and that an eviction of part of the rented premises by the landlord, was an extinguishment of the whole rent. I was doubtful at first, whether, on the issue, this evidence as to taking away the meadow crop, was admissible; but examination has removed that doubt. I find it laid down in many books, that, in debt for rent, the defendant may, under the plea of nil debet give in evidence an entry and expulsion by the landlord; and the doctrine, I think, applies a fortiori here.

Is this evidence such as would have authorized a jury to find an eviction? The principal enjoyment and possession of meadow, consists in the taking and using the hay: the man who does this, is to every rational purpose, the possessor. Therefore, the wrongful entry of the landlord into the meadow, and his forcible cutting and carrying away of the hay, might, I think, well have authorized a jury to find an eviction as to the meadow land; and the court on the demurrer must do the same.

But does this eviction of part suspend the whole rent? In the old books of the highest authority, this is explicitly laid down as settled law. Roll, Coke, Bacon, and many others, are express to this point; and they give, what seems to me, a sound reason for it. Thus Gilbert in his law of evidence, p. 283, says, "If the lessor enter into part, the whole rent is suspended, for the lessor cannot apportion it 486 *by an act of his own; for, if the party himself, by his own wrong, doth hinder himself from the benefit of his own intire contract, the jury ought not to decide it in his favour, for possibly the lessee would not have contracted for one part without the other. If a stranger evict the lessee of part of the land, the rent must be apportioned, for though part be taken away, since also some part remains, there is a part of the consideration money remaining due to the lessor, for otherwise the act of the law, in the stranger's recovery, would do wrong to the lessor." In 6 Bac. Abr. Rent, M. p. 49, it is said, "Where the lessor takes a lease of part of the land, or enters wrongfully into part, there are variety of opinions whether the intire rent shall not be suspended, during the continuance of such lease, or tortious entry; and in the last case, it seems to be the better opinion, and the settled law at this day, that the tenant is discharged from the payment of the whole rent, till he be restored to the whole possession, that no man may be encouraged to injure or disturb his tenant in his possession, whom by the policy of the feudal law, he is bound to protect." These are the old books: but

Starkie, a late writer of high authority, states the law in the same way: speaking of the lessee's defence under the plea of nil debet, he says—"So the lessee may shew an entry, or an expulsion from the premises by the lessor, or any suspension of rent by him, under this issue; for since the lessor by his own wrongful act deprives the party of the benefit of the intire contract, no apportionment can be made in his favour." Stark. Law Ev. part 4, vol. 2, p. 465. Chancellor Kent too, in his Commentaries (vol. 3, p. 376,) says, "If the landlord enters upon part of the demised premises by wrong, the better opinion is, that it suspends the payment of the whole rent, until the tenant be restored to the whole possession, for the lessor ought not to be able so to apportion his own wrong, as to oblige the tenant to pay any thing for the residue." In Cibell v. Hills, 18 Vin. Abr. Rent. I, a. pl. 2, p. 513, citing Leo. 110, the court held the continuing in possession of the landlord, was *not material, for if he does any thing amounting to an entry, though he depart presently, yet the possession is in him, sufficient to suspend the rent, and he shall be said extra tenere the defendant" &c. In Roll's Abr. 940, it is said, "If a man lease a rectory, for years, reserving rent, and upon part of the glebe, there is a sheep cot, and the lessor enter and pull it down, and the lessee reenter, and then the rent is in arrear; the rent is suspended, notwithstanding the reentry of the lessee, for part of the profits of the thing leased is taken from the lessee, to wit, his house, and that by the act of the lessor." So, in the case before us, part of the profits of the thing leased, the hay crop, was taken from the lessee, and that by the act of the lessor. These authorities prove clearly to me, that there was such an expulsion here, as justified the court in its judgment.

It was contended at the bar, that this, though admitted to be the ancient law, has been changed by the modern english decision; and that the rule now established there, is, that if the landlord evict the tenant from parcel of the premises, the tenant, if he quit the residue, is discharged from the whole rent; but if he continue in possession of the remainder, he is liable pro tanto: and for this Stark. Law Ev. part 4, vol. 3, p. 1520, and the cases there cited, are referred to. Starkie certainly lays down the rule, as stated, and cites in support of it Smith v. Raleigh, 3 Campb. 513, and Stokes v. Cooper, Id. 514, in a note. The first of these cases was assumpsit for use and occupation of a house and garden; plea, the general issue; it appeared, that after the defendant had agreed to take the premises, at an intire rent, and possession had been delivered to him, the plaintiff railed off a part of the garden, and built a privy upon it, for the use of a number of his other tenants, and the defendant thereupon returned the keys to him: lord Ellenborough ruled, that this amounted to an eviction from part of the demised premises; which, the taking being single, and the rent intire, he considered a complete answer to the action; and he nonsuited the plaintiff.

488 Surely, this case does not *furnish authority for the position, that the tenant continuing to hold the part from which he is not evicted, is liable pro tanto; for no such point was before the court, nor did the judge say a word about it: he simply held, that, in the case before him, the tenant was discharged. In his note to this case, the reporter says, "This case was recognized by Dallas, J., in Stokes v. Cooper, in which the rule was laid down, that after eviction from part, the landlord cannot recover upon the original contract, and the tenant by giving up possession of the residue, is intirely discharged; but that if the tenant, after the eviction, continues in possession of the residue, he may be liable upon a quantum meruit." This is a brief and loose note of a decision made on the circuit, and gives us a mere skeleton of the case. I take it that the case before the court was, like that before lord Ellenborough, and that the point adjudged was, that after eviction from part, the landlord cannot recover upon the original contract: if so, what is said about the quantum meruit was extrajudicial. And that it was so, seems the clearer from the case cited in support of the judgment; which is Dalston v. Reeve, 1 Ld. Raym. 77, where in covenant upon indenture for nonpayment of rent, the defendant pleaded eviction; the plaintiff demurred; and judgment was given for the defendant because it is rent, and the eviction is a suspension of it, and therefore a good plea. Now, I consider these cases as rather confirming, than going to overrule or change, the doctrine, that an eviction of part of the rented premises by the landlord, is a suspension of the whole rent: In the first, lord Ellenborough expressly says, that "an eviction from part of the demised premises, is a complete answer to the action." In the other, Mr. justice Dallas says, "that after eviction from part, the landlord cannot recover upon the original contract." In the case before us, the suit was brought upon the original contract; the plaintiff demurred to the defendant's evidence; that evidence shews an eviction of part of the premises, by the landlord; and the question of law raised by this demurrer is, whether, in law, this evidence 489 supports *the defendant's plea of non assumpsit? or in lord Ellenborough's language, whether "eviction of part is a complete answer to the action?" If indeed, these cases could be considered as meant to change the old and well established rule, I should reject their authority: they are, at best, but nisi prius decisions of a single judge; and I should say that the old rule is wise, humane and just, and the new one the contrary. How can the landlord complain of the law which says to him, "be just, and abide by your contract; if you take from your tenant a part of the premises, you shall receive no rent?" But look at the other side: a man rents a tract of land; it is of a size which suits his capital and his views; he would not rent a part of it; it would be too small; but after he has settled upon it, and made all his arrangements for a crop, his landlord comes and takes forcible possession of his best fields: he must either at an inclement or inconvenient season, turn himself out of house and home; or if he remains, you make him pay to this oppressive landlord, a portion of the rent. It is not consistent either with the policy or humanity of the law, thus to arm the strong against the weak.

But how can we, in the existing posture of the case, come at the question, whether the rent should be apportioned? The jury has found a verdict for the whole rent, the 70 dollars. No objection was made to this by the defendant; no motion was made to the court, to set aside the verdict for excessive damages: on the contrary the parties put themselves intirely upon the law of the case. The plaintiff demurs to the defendant's evidence, saying it is not sufficient in law, to maintain the issue on his part; the defendant says that the evidence is sufficient. Thus an issue in law is made up, and this is the sole point to be tried by the court. This, which is so clear in itself, has also the sanction of this court. In Humphreys v. West, 3 Rand. 518, judge Coalter said, "The court is of opinion, that the only question for their consideration, on a demurrer to evidence, is, whether the evidence supports the issue or not.

490 After the demurrer is *joined, the jury may either be discharged, and (if the judgment be that the evidence does support the issue) a writ of inquiry is awarded; or the jury then impeached, may go on to assess conditional damages. But, in either case, the question is with the jury, not the court, as to the question of damages; subject, as in all other cases to the superintending control of the court, to grant a new trial in case the damages are excessive. That however rests with the court before whom the trial was had; and that too, upon a motion to that court for a new trial; there being no case in which that court is bound, ex mero motu, and without motion, to grant a new trial, and subject the defendant, without his consent, to greater damages. The appellate court cannot grant such new trial; for that, would be to reverse the judgment of an inferior court, on a motion for a new trial here, which was not made to that court, and of course, on a matter in which that court committed no error." This was the unanimous judgment of a full court, and has never since (that I have heard of) been questioned. I am for affirming the judgment.

TUCKER, P. After having very much revolved this case, with which I have been perplexed, not only by the cases upon the subject of suspension of rent, and of use and occupation, but by the extremely awkward and unsatisfactory manner in which the demurrer is presented, I am inclined to think, that the whole question depends upon the fact, whether there was, in this case, any regular demise or lease? If there was a regular demise or lease, then it seems clear from the whole current of authorities, from the time of Roll to the passing of the statute of 11 Geo. 2, ch. 19, that general indebitatus assumpsit for use and occupation will not lie, unless upon a collateral promise, or where, as it is said, the promise is to pay a sum in gross. Wherever there was a regular demise, the landlord was supposed to have his remedy 491 *upon the contract itself. Thus, we are told in 1 Roll's Abr. 7, 8, that if a man leases for years reserving rent, assumpsit will not lie, either during the lease or after, because it savours of the realty. And this is perfectly consonant with general principles. For, in no case, can a man who has made an express contract abandon that, and recover under a contract implied or raised by law. He may have contracted for terms less favorable than the law would imply, and he must be bound by such contract. He cannot be permitted to abandon it, and recover more than he stipulated for, or on other terms than those stipulated.

Questions, however, often arose, in these cases, whether the engagement was to pay rent, or was a promise to pay a sum in gross? Whether an express promise to pay the rent reserved, was or was not collateral, or upon a new consideration? and whether there was a regular demise or not? For, if there was an express promise to pay a sum in gross, the action was maintainable; as where the declaration set forth, that in consideration that the plaintiff promised to make a lease for two years and to repair during the term, the defendant promised to pay twenty shillings per quarter; this was held to be a promise to pay a sum in gross, and therefore recoverable in assumpsit; 1 Roll's Abr. 7 O. case 3. And where there was any new consideration (such as forbearance to sue) and a promise to pay after the rent became due, the action was held to be maintainable; 1 Brownl. 14. So also where there was no regular demise, and the defendant nevertheless entered and enjoyed, by permission of the owner, the landlord might maintain an action for use and occupation; since, otherwise, he would have been without remedy. But where there was no such ground of exception to the general rule, that rule prevailed, that in case of an actual lease assumpsit would not lie. Green v. Harrington, 1 Brownl. 14; Mantel v. Brett, Hob. 397.

In consequence of these principles, nothing was more frequent at common law, in actions for use and occupation, than the nonsuit of the plaintiff by evidence 492 on the trial of *a regular demise. It was to remedy this inconvenience, that the stat. 11 Geo. 2, ch. 19, was enacted. See 4 Hen. & Munf. 168. The statute provides, that where the demise is not by deed, the landlord may bring the action for use and occupation, and if on the trial any parol demise or agreement (not being by deed) whereon rent is reserved, shall appear in evidence, the plaintiff shall not therefore be nonsuited, but may use it as evidence of the quantum of damages. This statute never was in force with us, nor have we any similar provision. We stand, therefore, upon the old common law, which permits a recovery in indebitatus assumpsit for use and occupation, either upon an express or implied promise where there has been no regular demise, but denies it where there has been such demise, unless in cases of collateral promises, or promises upon new consideration, or a promise to pay a sum in gross. That the action is sustainable upon an express or implied promise under such circumstances, is clearly established by the case of Eppes v. Cole, 4 Hen. & Munf. 161, and by the cases there cited. The apparent collision between some of these cases and others to be found in the books, may be explained by an attention to the distinctions above mentioned. See Chambers's Landlord and Tenant 687.

In this view, then, it is essential to determine, whether there was or was not a regular demise in this case; and from a careful examination of the demurrer, I am of opinion there was not. [Here, the judge entered into an examination of the evidence set out in the demurrer, to shew the justness of this conclusion.] If there was no regular demise, then the action for use and occupation will lie; and, in that action, the question of eviction does not arise, but the plaintiff is entitled to recover for that part actually enjoyed, but for that part only. Tomlinson v. Day, 3 Brod. & Bing. 680, 6 Eng. C. L. R. 315. Now, it seems, that, in this case, the promise to pay the 70 dollars was for the whole land including the meadow; and as the meadow was not enjoyed, the rent should be apportioned.

493 Or, (to consider *it in another light) the tenant having enjoyed the land, without the meadow, should only be compelled to pay for the part enjoyed.

The verdict, however, has found the whole 70 dollars, subject to the opinion of the court on the demurrer. Shall the plaintiff then recover the whole sum, because the court is of opinion the evidence does support an action? By no means. I am of opinion, that the evidence maintains the action, indeed, but only for part of the sum. The verdict, therefore, has not so found the damages as to enable the court to pronounce judgment. Upon the case presented, the jury ought either to have been discharged without inquiring of damages, or they ought to have found the damages with a double aspect; namely, so much if the plaintiff was entitled to the whole rent, and so much if he was not entitled to rent for the meadow. This not being done, the verdict, I think, should be set aside, and a writ of inquiry awarded. But the other judges being of opinion that there is no error in the judgment, it must be affirmed.

Pierce v. Massenburg.

[26 Am. Dec. 333.]

Infants—Apprenticeship—Infant Necessary Party.—A father cannot bind his infant child apprentice by indentures to which the child is not a party; and indentures of apprenticeship executed by the father, without the child's concurrence, are not voidable only, but void.

This was an action on the case, in the circuit court of Norfolk, brought by Massenburg against Pierce, for enticing away and keeping and detaining in his Pierce's service, two apprentices and servants of Massenburg, named Minson and Face. Plea, the general issue. Verdict for the plaintiff for 650 dollars, subject to the opinion of the court on a case stated, which was thus:

494 *There were two indentures of apprenticeship executed, the one between Minson's father and Massenburg, and the other between Face's father and Massenburg, whereby the fathers, respectively, bound their sons, then infants, to Massenburg, a pilot, till they should attain to full age, to learn the art and mystery of a pilot for Chesapeake bay and James river; but the indentures were not signed by the infant sons, respectively, nor were they in any way parties to them. And the question referred to the court, was, whether these indentures could be received in evidence, to prove the apprenticeship, or any legal contract of service, such as would entitle the plaintiff to maintain this action?

The circuit court held that the law was for the plaintiff, and gave him judgment for the damages assessed by the verdict; to which this court, on the petition of Pierce allowed a supersedeas.

Leigh, for the plaintiff in error, said, that it was now well settled, that a father cannot bind his infant son as an apprentice or servant, without his assent; The King v. Cromford, 8 East 25; The King v. Ripon, 9 East. 295; The King v. Arnesby, 3 Barn. & Ald. 583.

The attorney general, for the defendant in error, said, that whatever might be the common law on the point (as to which there had been some contrariety of opinion) the right of a father to bind his infant child apprentice, was plainly recognized by the statute law of Virginia; which provides, that any apprentice bound by his father, may, with the approbation of the county or corporation court, after he shall be sixteen years of age, agree to serve until he shall be twenty-four, or any shorter time; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 108, § 27, p. 411. Besides, he said, this was an action for a tort, and the defendant stood convicted of the wrong by the verdict. Such a wrongdoer could not avail himself of any defect in the contract of apprenticeship of the plaintiff's apprentices, whom he had seduced from the service of their master, though the apprentices themselves might not have 495 *been bound to fulfil the indentures executed by their parents; Keane v. Boycott, 2 H. Blacks. 511.

CARR, J. I consider the question submitted to the court, to have been substantially this, whether a father can bind his infant son apprentice by deed without the assent of the son? If he could, then Massenburg had a right of action against Pierce, for enticing his apprentices from his service; if not, then he had no such right. This subject, I consider as untouched by any provision of our own statute law. When the attorney general quoted the statute providing that any apprentice bound by his father, may with the approbation of the court, after he shall be sixteen years of age, agree to serve till he shall be twenty-four or any shorter time, it struck me that the words bound by his father, seemed to acknowledge an unqualified power in the father to bind the son; but further examination has changed this impression. I find by the doctrines of the common law, long and well established, that a father cannot bind his infant son apprentice, without the assent of his son, and such assent proved by his signature to the indenture; but that, in this manner, he may bind him. This being the common law doctrine, well known to our law makers, when they speak of an apprentice bound by his father, they mean, I conclude, bound in that way in which a father may bind his son; that is, with his assent, shewn by his joining in the deed. If the statute had intended to abrogate the common law, and to confer on the father a new power, it would have used words expressive of such intent: but those employed clearly speak of an existing power, without meaning to add to or detract from it. As to the common law on the point, the authorities cited for the appellant, are decisive. I think the judgment must be reversed, and judgment entered for the appellant.

CABELL and BROOKE, J., concurred.
496 *TUCKER, P. The authority of a father to bind his son apprentice without his consent, is distinctly denied by various authorities; as appears in the case of The King v. Arnesby, cited at the bar. The passage in Com. Dig. Justice of peace, B. 55, which was quoted in that case, to sustain the power of the father, is truly declared to be unsupported by authority. In like manner, in The King v. Cromford, the indenture was held invalid because the infant had not executed it.

*For the proposition laid down in the syllabus, the principal case was cited in State v. Reuff, 29 W. Va. 757, 3 S. E. Rep. 804. See also, monographic note on "Infants" appended to Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Gratt. 505.

Lewin on Settlements 251, 2. If the case was of the first impression, I should be of the same opinion. It is going very far to establish a rule by which every father would have the right to bind his child without his consent, whatever be his age or his circumstances, or the service, or the terms of that service. It would vest the power over a child on the borders of maturity, in a father perhaps his inferior in discretion, and for the profit of the father, at the expense of the degradation of the child. Such a power cannot readily be conceded, and is, as we have seen, without authority to sustain it.

Respectable authorities, indeed, have asserted a right in the child to bind himself without his father's concurrence; The King v. Mountsorrel, 3 M. & S. 497; The King v. Great Wigston, 3 Barn. & Cress. 484; The King v. Chillesford, 4 Id. 94; 10 Eng. C. L. R. 161, 279; Lewin 247. If such right really exists, it is obviously incompatible with the asserted right of the father. But as it is unnecessary to decide that question here; as the English cases on these questions, intermingle principles of the common law very frequently with statutory provisions, which it would require some pains to separate; and as the question of the emancipation of the child from parental authority is one of great delicacy, I shall not now venture to give an opinion upon it. See as to emancipation, 5 Barn. & Ald. 525; 1 Barn. & Cress. 348; Lewin 80, 81.

It was very strongly argued, that the wrongdoer cannot avail himself of the defect of the contract of apprenticeship; and Keane v. Boycott was cited. There 497 is no doubt, that *where there is a contract of service, though it may be voidable between the parties, the wrongdoer cannot set up that as a defence. But the reason is, not merely that it is no concern of his, but that the contract being only avoidable, it may be avoided or affirmed at the pleasure of the party. Thus, in the case of the negro boy who bound himself when a slave and under age, and who was seduced from his master's service, it was decided, that the defendant could not make the objections of infancy and duress. The privilege was personal to the infant, who might waive it and conform to the contract, even if it was avoidable (which by the way, it is not admitted to be, in all the cases; 6 T. R. 557; 3 Barn. & Cress. 487; Lewin 299). So, in Westerdell v. Dale, 7 T. R. 310, it is said, that an indenture for a shorter period than that required by the statute of Elizabeth, is not void but only voidable, and that at the election of the parties themselves; and that a third person cannot set up the objection. But these are cases in which there is a contract, though a voidable contract. But here is a case of no contract at all. In those cases, the contract might have been affirmed: in this, there is none to affirm. The infant's assent by act in pais, by any act short of joining in the indenture would not suffice to bind him; 3 Barn. & Ald. 584. The defendant may therefore well object, that there was no contract of service. Thus, in The King v. Cromford, where the indentures are considered void, it was strongly asked, how an action could be maintained by the supposed master against any person who should seduce the apprentice from his service.

This point is yet more clear if the child can bind himself without his father's concurrence. For, if the father cannot bind the child, and the child can bind himself, then he who contracts for the service of the child with the child himself, must of course be protected by that contract, and have a right to rely on it. Otherwise, the child must yield to the unauthorized act of the father, or be an outcast incapable of getting into service. This cannot be.

498 *I am of opinion, upon the whole, that the indentures in this case, were not admissible "to prove the apprenticeship or a legal contract of service such as to enable the plaintiff to maintain his action." And the jury having found their verdict subject to the opinion of the court upon the point thus reserved, I think the judgment should have been for the defendant.

Judgment reversed, and judgment entered for the appellant.

Tod v. Baylor.

May, 1833.

Deeds—Married Women—Privy Examination—Certificate—Sufficiency.—A certificate of a privy examination of a feme covert to a conveyance of real estate by husband and wife, before commissioners in the country, under the statute of conveyances of 1793, states, that the feme made her acknowledgment of the conveyance of the land contained in the conveyance thereto annexed, freely and voluntarily, and that she was willing the same should be recorded, without stating that the feme declared that she had willingly signed and sealed the deed, and without stating that it was shewn and explained to her by the commissioners: Held, if the feme had in fact signed the deed, such certificate of privy examination is substantially a compliance with the requisitions of the statute, and good, and the feme is bound by the deed; but if the feme had not signed the deed, such acknowledgment, so certified, is not sufficient to make the deed binding on her, within the requisitions of the statute.

Acknowledgments—Married Women—Certificate—Compliance with Statute.—The certificate of acknowledgment of a married woman to a conveyance of real estate need not show a literal compliance with the statute: where there has been a substantial compliance therewith, it is sufficient. To this effect, the principal case is cited with approval in Hockman v. McClanahan, 87 Va. 37, 12 S. E. Rep. 230; Virginia, etc., Co. v. Robertson, 88 Va. 118, 13 S. E. Rep. 350; foot-note to McClanahan v. Siter, 2 Gratt. 280; Hurst v. Leckie, 97 Va. 563, 34 S. E. Rep. 464; Grove v. Zumbro, 14 Gratt. 501, 514, and foot-note; *Hairston v. In Hairston v. Randolphs, 12 Leigh 445, 461, and foot-note, the principal case was distinguished from the case at bar on the ground that two cases were governed by different statutes, and that the statute governing the principal case did not require that the certificate should show that the "deed was explained to the wife." To the point that the law, as it stood when the principal case was decided did not require that it should appear from the certificate that the deed was shown and explained to the wife at the time of her privy examination, the principal case was cited also in Groves v. Zumbro, 14 Gratt. 516; Watson v. Michael, 21 W. Va. 573; Laidley v. Central Land Co., 30 W. Va. 512, 613, 4 S. E. Rep. 709.

allenee of her husband, for dower of lands aliened by the husband in his lifetime, the widow is dowerable of the lands, as of the value thereof at the time of alienation, not at the time of assignment of dower: she is entitled to no advantage from enhancement of the value, either by improvements made by the alienee, or from general rise in value, or from any cause whatever.

Same-Same-Account of Profits.—Upon a bill in equity by a widow against an allenee of the husband for dower of lands sold, she is not entitled to an account of profits from the death of the husband, but only from the date of the subpoena in the cause: otherwise, upon a bill against the heir.

John Baylor deceased, by deed, in his lifetime, dated the 25th November 1801, in consideration of 2550 dollars, 499 *conveyed to George Tod, in fee simple, a parcel of land (300 acres) in Caroline. This deed purported, in the body of it, to be the deed of Baylor and of Anne his wife; but the husband only signed and sealed it; and though there was another seal to it, put there for the wife, she did not sign the deed.

And by another deed, dated the 12th October 1803, purporting to be the deed of Baylor and wife, and signed and sealed by them both, in consideration of 2624 dollars, they conveyed to Tod, another parcel of land (320 acres) in the same county.

Commissions for the privy examination of the wife as to both the deeds, were issued from the county court of Caroline, and directed to two justices of the peace for the county. The commission as to the first deed of November 1801, recited that the deed had been executed by the husband and Anne the wife, and that the wife could not conveniently travel to the county court to make acknowledgment thereof; and empowered the commissioners to receive the acknowledgment, which the wife should be willing to make before them, of the conveyance contained in the deed, which was annexed to the commission; and then proceeded in these words—"And we do, therefore, command you that you, do personally go to the said Anne, and receive her acknowledgment of the same, and examine her privily and apart from the said John Baylor her husband, whether she doth the same freely and voluntarily, without his persuasions or threats, and whether she is willing that the same shall be recorded in our said county court: and when you have received her acknowledgment and examined her as aforesaid, that you distinctly certify us thereof in our said court, sending then there the said indenture and this writ." And the form of the commission as to the last deed of October 1803, was exactly the same, mutatis mutandis.

The certificate of the justices who executed the commission as to the first deed, returned under their hands and 500 *seals, indorsed on the commission, was in these words: "Agreeably to the power to us granted by the within com-uation.—The principal case was cited in Verlander v. Harvey, 36 W. Va. 377, 15 S. E. Rep. 55, as establishing the principle that, where land is aliened by a husband in his lifetime, the value of the dower of his widow, when commuted, should be estimated at the time of the alienation or sale, and not at the time of the death of the husband.

Same-Same-Right of Widow to Mesne Profits.—See the principal case cited in Thomas v. Gammel, 6 Leigh 13, 14, and foot-note: and distinguished in *Macaulay v. mission, we have this 10th August 1802, personally gone to Mrs. Anne Baylor, and examined her privily and apart from her said husband,—who makes to us her acknowledgment of the conveyance of 300 acres of land contained in the indenture hereto annexed, freely and voluntarily, without the threats or persuasions of her husband, and that she is willing the same shall be recorded in the county court of Caroline." And the certificate of the justices who executed the commission as to the last deed, was the same, mutatis mutandis.

Both the deeds, with the commissions for the privy examination of the feme covert, and the certificates of privy examination, were duly recorded.

John Baylor, the husband, died in September 1824. And in 1827, his widow, Mrs. Baylor, exhibited her bill in the superior court of chancery of Fredericksburg, against George Tod, the purchaser of the two parcels of land in the deeds conveyed; alleging, that neither of the deeds was so executed by her according to the provisions of the statute then in force,* as to make the same binding on her; and praying, therefore, that dower might be assigned her of both parcels of land; and an account of the rents and profits from the death of her husband.

Tod, in his answer, admitted the facts, but insisted, that the deeds were both duly executed by Mrs. Baylor, and that she had thereby relinquished her right of dower in the lands.

The chancellor, by an interlocutory decree, appointed and directed commissioners in the country, with the assistance of the surveyor of Caroline, to lay off and assign to Mrs. Baylor, one equal third part of both the parcels of land in question, respectively, having regard to quantity 501 and *quality, to be held by her for her dower in the lands: and he ordered a commissioner of the court to take and report an account of the profits from the death of John Baylor, the husband, to the time when the dower should be assigned to the widow, and also an account of all the permanent improvements made by Tod on the lands.

The commissioners in the country, reported that they had proceeded, in pursuance of the decree, "to assign to Mrs. Baylor, 140 acres of land, by metes and bounds, as laid down in the plot [returned with the report], being, in their estimation, one third of the parcel of 300 acres of land conveyed by John Baylor to the defendant, by the deed of November 1801, having regard to quantity and quality"—and also "to assign to her 110 acres of land, by metes and bounds as laid down in the plot, being, in their estimation, one third, according to quantity and quality, of the parcel of land conveyed by Baylor to the defendant, by the deed of October 1803," which parcel was found to contain 328 acres.

The commissioner of the court reported an account of the profits, and an account of the value of the permanent improvements that had been made by Tod. He stated the annual value of the whole of the lands, to be 280 dollars; and that the aggregate profits of the whole, at that rate, for the time from the death of Baylor to the assignment of dower to his widow, was 1068 dollars. And he stated the value of the permanent improvements made by Tod, to be 1270 dollars. But it did not appear from the report, whether in his estimate of the profits, he stated the yearly value of the land without reference to Tod's improvements, or the yearly value as enhanced by those improvements.

*The statute of 1792, 1 Old Rev. Code, ch. 90, § 6, Pleasants's ed. pp. 157, 8. A copy of it is given in a note in the report of Langhorne v. Hobson, ante 225. —Note in Original Edition.

No exceptions being taken to either report, the chancellor, on the final hearing, approved and confirmed them; and decreed, according to the first report, that Tod should surrender to the widow, the two parcels of land laid off for her dower, and should pay her 356 dollars, being one third of the amount of profits of the whole 502 of the lands, as stated in *the second report. From this decree, Tod appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Stanard for the appellant, and Leigh for the appellee.

I. Stanard insisted, that the court of chancery ought not to have entertained jurisdiction of the case; for the foundation of the jurisdiction of the court, in matters of dower, was the necessity of its aid for a discovery of title papers, and for removing impediments to her rendering her legal title available at law; and whenever, on a bill in equity for dower, doubts have arisen as to the legal title to dower, the constant practice had been to put her to bring her writ of dower. 1 Fonb. Eq. 19, in notes; 1 Rop. on Prop. Husband and Wife, 445, 6; Curtis v. Curtis, 2 Bro. C. C. 620. In the present case, the only question was a mere point of law; namely, whether the wife had so joined in the conveyances of her husband to Tod, as to make them her own, and so to preclude her from demanding dower? She ought to have been sent to a court of law, to try that question and establish her right.

Leigh answered, that however narrow were the grounds on which the court of chancery originally assumed jurisdiction in matters of dower, the jurisdiction was now established on principles that embraced all cases of dower without exception; and this, he said, appeared from the authorities cited for the appellant. It was true, that the practice of the court of chancery in England, when doubts arose as to the legal title of the widow to dower, was to put her to bring her action at law to establish her title, retaining her bill, however, in order to give her relief if she should establish her right at law; a practice that might be proper enough there, but there was no reason for such a practice in our courts, and none such was known here.

II. Stanard contended, that the appellee was a party to both the deeds of her husband conveying the lands in question to Tod; and thereby relinquished her 503 possibility of *dower. That she intended to join in the deeds, there could be no doubt; the only question was, whether she had so executed her purpose, as to make the deeds binding on her, according to the provisions of the statute of conveyances of 1792? She actually signed, sealed and delivered the second deed of October 1803. As to the first deed, that of November 1801, she did not, indeed, sign it; but her husband signed, sealed and delivered it, and there was another seal put to it, which was intended to be hers, and which she recognized as hers in the acknowledgment of the deed made by her to the commissioners; and the very act of acknowledging it and consenting that it should be recorded, was a delivery of it. Therefore, this deed also must be taken to have been sealed and delivered by her, according to the provisions of the statute. Then, with regard to the commissions for her privy examination, and the certificates of the privy examination returned by the commissioners, which were precisely alike in respect to both deeds, he maintained, that, if they did not comply in words with the requisitions of the statute, yet they conformed with them in substance; Langhorne v. Hobson, ante 224; Harvey v. Borden, 2 Wash. 156; Ware v. Cary, 2 Call 263. And he argued, that the statute prescribed the duty to be performed by the commissioners in the privy examination of a feme covert, but did not require that they should state, in their certificate, all the particulars of such privy examination; and there being not the least reason here, to suspect unfairness in the transaction, it ought to be intended; that the commissioners performed their duty in the manner required by law. The extreme nicety and rigor, which would avoid the privy examinations in this case, would be alike applicable, doubtless, to very numerous cases, and would shake most of the land titles in the country derived from femes covert.

Leigh said, it was clear that the appellee had not executed the first deed of November 1801, within the meaning of the statute of 1792; for the statute provided for the privy examination of a feme covert only 504 in respect to deeds sealed *and delivered by husband and wife; and if the sealing and delivery by the wife might properly be inferred from her acknowledgment of the deed on privy examination, the provision that she should have sealed and delivered the deed, was nugatory and idle; since her acknowledgment of the instrument was required in every case, in order to make it binding on her; and if that were tantamount to sealing and delivery by her, it had been enough to require the acknowledgment. But the statute expressly required, that the feme covert should declare that she had willingly signed and sealed the deed: the signing, then was certainly necessary. As to the commissions for the privy examination of the feme covert in this case, he had thought that such commissions, under the statute of 1792, ought to prescribe to the commissioners the essential particulars of the duty which the statute required them to perform, and that if the commission omitted any of them, i was fatally defective: but the judgment in Langhorne v. Hobson obviated all his objections to these commissions; these being in the same form with the commission in that case, and the objections to the commission there having been disregarded, though very strenuously urged. But, certainly, the commissioners were bound to perform the duty required of them by the statute, in all essential particulars, and to certify the execution of the commission to the court. The manner and particulars of the execution of it, could only appear by the certificate thereof: that was to be recorded, in order that it might thereby appear, whether or no the feme covert had been duly examined, and had duly acknowledged the instrument. Now, the statute required that the feme covert, being privily examined by the commissioners, should "declare that she willingly signed and sealed the writing, to be then shewn and explained to her." It was plainly intended that the deed should be shewn to the wife, in order to identify it; that she should be examined as to the identical writing; and that she should acknowledge her signing and sealing of that: but here, the commissioners only certified, that the wife 505 acknowledged "her conveyance of the lands contained in the deeds," not these identical conveyances thereof, nor that she had signed and sealed any conveyance; and though they added that the deeds were annexed to their certificates, such annexations might have been and (for aught that appeared) were made, after the privy examinations were completed. The statute required, not only that the instrument should be shewn to the feme covert, but that it should be explained to her; that the commissioners should inform her of its contents and effect: it constituted them the judicial advisers of the feme covert as to her rights, in order to guard her against a surrender of them through ignorance or weakness: it intended to substitute them when the privy examination was made in pais, in place of the judges when it was made in open court. In Langhorne v. Hobson, the commissioners certified that they read the deed to the feme covert. In the present case, they did not certify that the deeds were read to the feme covert, or that they were in any way explained to her, or even that they were shewn to her that she might get a knowledge of their contents for herself; and, for aught that appeared, the acknowledgment which they said she made before them, might have been made in perfect ignorance of the contents, purpose or effects of the deeds. If such privy examinations as these were good and effectual, it would be hard to imagine any that would be faulty and unoperative.

III. Stanard insisted, 1. that if the appellee was entitled to dower of the lands in question, she was not entitled to be endowed thereof as of the increased value produced by the permanent improvements made by the purchaser, Tod; and 2. that she ought to have been endowed of the lands as of the value at the time of the alienation, not as of the increased value, produced by the appreciation of the property from any cause whatever, at the time the dower was assigned. He cited Harg. Co. Litt. 32a, note 8, from Hale's MSS. 1 Rep. on Prop. 347; 4 Kent's Comm. 64.

Leigh answered, 1. that it did not appear, that, in the assignment of dower to the appellee, the commissioners had 506 *given her any benefit from the permanent improvements made by Tod; and it was plain enough that they did not: for the attention of the parties had been drawn to the subject of Tod's improvements, since the court had ordered an account of them, and yet no exception was taken to the report of the assignment of dower on this or indeed any other ground. 2. He admitted, that the widow was not entitled to take any advantage of any increase of value produced by improvements made by the purchaser; but he contended, that she was entitled to the advantage of any increased value of the land produced by general causes, unconnected with the improvements made by the purchaser. This was chancellor Kent's opinion, upon a review of the authorities on the point, in his commentaries, vol. 4, pp. 65, 6, 7, and in a note there, he explained that that was the extent to which he intended to go in Hale v. James, 6 Johns. Rep. 258. The point was most fully and learnedly discussed by Tilghman, C. J., in Thompson v. Morrow, 5 Serg. & Raw. 289, and by Story, J., in Powell v. M. & B. Man. Co., 3 Mason 347. And they held, that the widow was indeed to take no advantage of any increase of value produced by improvements made by the purchaser, but throwing those out of the estimate, she was to be endowed according to the value at the time of the assignment of dower; and, moreover, that there was never any rule of the common law to the contrary. It were strange if there had been. The widow must sustain the loss in case of depreciation of the lands; yet the doctrine contended for denied her any advantage from the rise in value. Besides, the right of dower was a right to one third of the land in kind, of which the husband was seized at any time during the coverture; and it was admitted, that the husband could not by his alienation, bar her of that right: but, according to this doctrine, he might fix conclusively the price of her right of dower, which yet he could not sell, and bind her to take land to the value of one third of the price for which he thought proper to sell.

507 *IV. Stanard objected, that the decree gave the widow profits from the death of her husband; which, he said, she certainly was not entitled to demand against Tod, a purchaser from the husband in his lifetime. The common law gave the widow no damages. The statute of Virginia, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 107, § 4, p. 403, taken from the statute of Merton, 20 Hen. 3, ch. 1, gave the widow damages only when she was deforced of her dower of lands whereof her husband died seized; and equity, following the law, could give her the profits only in that case.

Leigh said, the courts of chancery went further than the courts of law in respect to the profits of dower lands. Curtis v. Curtis, 2 Bro. C. C. 620; Mundy v. Mundy, 4

Id. 294; Oliver v. Richardson, 9 Ves. 222. In Curtis v. Curtis, a widow filed a bill against the heir for dower; she and the heir both died pending the suit; and it was admitted that damages were not recoverable at law against a party who was dead; yet the court decreed the profits to the widow's representative; and it was expressly said, that in decrees for doweresses, courts of equity give a remedy beyond what courts of law can give; 2 Bro. C. C. 628. He also cited 1 Rop. on Prop. 447, 8, 9, where it is said, that it is the course of the courts of equity to assign the widow her dower, and universally to give her an account of profits from the death of her husband; and that her right to an account of them in equity, may be inferred against heir or alienee, or their representatives.

CARR, J. The directions of the statute of 1792, as to the privy examination of femes covert by commissioners in the country, touching their acknowledgments of deeds, seem to me clear and explicit. The commissioners are commanded, 1. to examine the wife privily and apart from her husband; 2. to take her declaration that she willingly signed and sealed the deed, which they are then to shew and explain to her; 3. that she consents that it may be recorded. And the commissioners are to return with their commission, 508 *a certificate, 1. of such privy examination; 2. of such declaration made; and 3. of such consent yielded. It was contended strongly, that the certificate must state also, that the deed was shewn and explained to the feme; but this seems to me to be adding to the requisitions of the law. It is clear, that the commissioners are directed to shew and explain the deed to her, on her privy examination; but this need not be certified; for the law expressly limits the certificate to the privy examination, the declaration, and the consent. Words could not make this plainer, as it seems to me. The certificates are alike in the two deeds before us. They are to the following effect: "We have this day gone to Mrs. Baylor, and examined her privily and apart from her husband" (here is the first requisite of the law, the privy examination, clearly stated) "who makes to us her acknowledgment of the conveyance of the 320 acres of land contained in the indenture hereunto annexed, freely and voluntarily;" that is, as I understand it, who makes to us her acknowledgment, or declaration, that she freely and voluntarily conveyed the 320 acres contained in the indenture thereto annexed; which, to my mind, is a perfectly substantial compliance with the second requisite of the law, namely, a declaration that she willingly signed and sealed the said writing. The certificate proceeds, "and that she is willing the same shall be recorded in the county court of Caroline:" here is the third requisite. My opinion is, then, that to every reasonable and substantial purpose of the law, this is a good and sufficient certificate.

Upon an examination of the deed of 1801, it appears, that though it purports to be the deed of the wife, and she has thus acknowledged the execution of it, yet she has never in fact signed it. Upon the general doctrine, that sealing and delivery constitute the deed with the persons sui juris, and that, with a feme covert, the privy examination is the vital principle, I was strongly inclined to consider this deed binding on the widow. But the statute of 1792, by requiring the wife to declare 509 on her examination, *that she willingly signed and sealed the deed, raises some doubt, whether the legislature did not contemplate her signing as necessary; and two of my brethren think the deed, for want of this, not binding on her. I therefore yield the inclination of my mind on that point.

The next objection taken to the decree is, that it directs the dower to be allotted according to the present value of the land with all its present improvements, instead of the value at the time of alienation. I consider it the clear rule of the common law; that where a husband aliens during coverture, and the widow claims dower in those lands after his death, she shall not be entitled to dower according to the improved value of the land, but must take her dower according to the value at the time of alienation. Fitz. Abr. tit. Dower, § 192; Perk. tit. Dower, § 328; Harg. Co. Litt. 32a, n. 8, citing Hale's MSS. 1 Rop. on Prop. 346; 4 Kent's Comm. 64; Humphrey v. Phinney, 2 Johns. Rep. 484; Hale v. James, 6 Johns. Ch. Rep. 258. This doctrine seems to rest on ground similar to that of the recovery of a vendee of land against the vendor, on eviction; which, on great consideration, we have fixed at the purchase money with interest, in Stout v. Jackson, 2 Rand. 132, and Threlkeld v. Fitzhugh, 2 Leigh 451.

Another objection taken to the decree, is, that the chancellor has given rents and profits from the death of the husband. I think, in a case of alienation by the husband, this was wrong. At law such profits could be given only as to land of which the husband died seized; and I think equity, which takes jurisdiction, in these cases, only from the superiour convenience of its proceeding, ought in this point to follow the law. But for a fuller view of this subject, I refer to the reasons and authorities which will be stated by the president.

CABELL, J., concurred.

510 *BROOKE, J. The statute of conveyances of 1792, requiring that a feme covert shall declare to the commissioners for her privy examination, that she willingly signed and sealed the deed, leaves no ground for a construction that would dispense with that part of the execution of the deed by the feme covert. Although the sealing and delivery of the deed is, by the common law, the essence of its execution, and though when the privy examination is before the court of record, that is all that is required by the statute; yet we cannot intend, that sealing and delivery is all the statute requires, when the privy examination is had before commissioners in the country, against the express letter of the statute. It would be doing great violence to the language of the law, to dispense with signing by the feme covert. Since seals, except by mere scrolls, have gone out of use, signing is better evidence of the execution of a deed than sealing with a scroll, which may be at all times forged without the probability of detection. When the privy examination of a feme covert is had before a court of record, the signing by her seems not to be required; yet when it is had before commissioners in the country, the signing may have been required as an indispensable guard against fraud. I think, therefore, that the first deed was not duly executed by Mrs. Baylor, according to the statute of 1792.

As to the second deed, which was signed by her, I think the certificate of her privy examination by the commissioners in the country, substantially good and sufficient; and that she has no claim to dower in the land conveyed by that deed. But as to the deed which she did not sign, though the certificate of the commissioners of her privy examination as to it, would also have been sufficient if she had signed it, she is not barred of her dower as to the lands thereby conveyed by her husband by that deed.

Whether she is entitled to be endowed, according to the value of the land at the time of the alienation by her husband, or at the time of the assignment of her dower, is another question. The 4th section of our statute of dower *certainly does not embrace the case before us.

It is, substantially, taken from the statute of Merton, which only provided for the case in which dower is claimed by a feme covert, of lands of which her husband died seized. And this provision was an exception to the rule of the common law in all droitual actions, in which no damages were recovered; and cannot be extended beyond the provision, on any ground of policy or supposed hardship. In truth, in the case before us, it is more than probable, as the value of lands has generally fallen, that the value of the land was much greater at the date of the deed of alienation, than at this time; so that the rule of the common law is a better rule for the feme covert than the rule under the statute. And the rule of the common law is more consonant with the rule established by this court, in the cases of Stout v. Jackson and Threlkeld v. Fitzhugh; namely, that the value of the land at the date of the warranty, and not at the time of eviction, is the true measure of damages. It would be very hard on the alienee, to subject him to greater damages than he could recover upon the warranty of the husband against the heir, according to the decisions just mentioned. For the rule of the common law in regard to such cases as that now before us, I refer to the authorities cited by judge Carr.

On these grounds, I think the decree of the chancellor must be reversed, and the cause remanded for farther proceedings; in which dower is to be assigned to the appellee, of the lands conveyed by the first deed which she did not sign, according to the value at the date of the alienation by her husband, with the rents and profits from the suing out the subpoena in this cause.

TUCKER, P. The first question in this case, arises on the construction of the statute of conveyances of 1792. Disencumbering that section of the statute, of those words which are not immediately necessary in deciding this question, it provides that "when husband and wife shall have sealed and delivered a writing purporting to be a conveyance *of any estate or interest, if, before two justices who may be empowered by commission to examine her privily and take her acknowledgment, the wife, being examined privily and apart from her husband, shall declare that she willingly signed and sealed the said writing, to be then shewn and explained to her by them, and consenteth that it may be recorded, and the said commissioners shall return with the said commission, and thereunto annexed, a certificate under their hands and seals of such privy examination and declaration, and consent yielded by her," then the deed shall be binding on the wife.

According to this statute, the commission ought to recite, that the husband and wife had sealed and delivered a conveyance purporting to be a conveyance [here setting forth succinctly of what, or otherwise referring to the writing so as to describe it] and should empower the justice to examine her privily and take her acknowledgment of the said writing; and such commission, without more saying, would be good; for it is in the words of the law. And even if not literally in those words, yet if it be substantially so, it will suffice, or many titles in the country would be shaken. Thus, in the present case, though it is not stated, in terms, that the parties had sealed and delivered a conveyance, it is stated that "by indenture (which is a writing sealed and delivered) dated the 12th October 1803, they had sold and conveyed" an estate &c. This is a substantial compliance, and therefore good.

Now as to the certificate. The law is not content with the justices merely echoing the commission, by certifying that they had privily examined the wife, and she had acknowledged the writing; but it goes on to prescribe what shall be certified by them. The wife, being examined privily and apart from her husband, must declare that she willingly signed and sealed the writing, to be then shewn and explained to her; and must consent that it be recorded. The justices are then to certify such privy examination (that is, that she was examined privily and apart from her husband) and such *declaration made (that is, that she willingly signed and sealed the writing) and such consent yielded by her (that is, that it be recorded). Nothing can be more clear than the construction of this clause, except as to the words "to be then shewn and explained to her:" they do not seem, by a literal construction, to require the fact of shewing and explaining the deed to be expressly certified; for they stand out, as it were, from the rest of the clause, and seem merely directory. Yet, as in acts in pais, those presumptions are not usually made, that every thing has been rightly done unless the contrary appears, which are made by law in relation to the transactions of a court, it has been always my impression that, in strictness, this matter also must be certified or must in some form appear. If the question was now of the first impression, I should be for construing the statute with very great strictness. It prescribes the mode in which a person may convey, whose power of conveying was before circumscribed to the forms known to the common law. It is an innovation upon that law; it prescribes a form of conveyance unknown to it. It ought, therefore, to have been required to be strictly complied with: a literal compliance would not indeed have been demanded, but a substantial compliance in every thing material. I fear, however, that the practice of the country, ever since the introduction of the commission, has been very far from conforming to the requisitions of the law, with any thing like strictness. The alternative is therefore presented, of abating somewhat of this rigor, or of running the risk of shaking land titles. If the case of dower was alone in question, it would be less important, but conveyances of the maiden land of femes covert would also be involved. Our predecessors, accordingly, seem to have been cautious in their decisions upon the laws which were the originals of this statute. In Harvey v. Borden, 2 Wash. 156, it did not appear from any part of the record, that the commissioners were justices of the peace, as was required by the statute of 1748; they were not so styled in the commission: yet 514 the court overruled "the objection, judge Roane saying, 'the law requires the clerk to direct it to such persons, and he ought not to be presumed to have done wrong;'" and judge Fleming said, "I do not think that we carry the doctrine of presumption beyond its accustomed limits, when we say, that to support this deed we will intend that the law has been obeyed unless the contrary appear." In Ware v. Cary, 2 Call 263, the names of the justices were omitted; the commission was directed to — gentlemen justices; it was executed by two persons, who certified "that they acted by virtue of the commission thereto annexed," but they did not say "directed to us," nor did they certify that they were justices of the peace: yet the objection was overruled. Influenced by like considerations in the recent case of Langhorne v. Hobson, this court overruled the objections to the commission and privy examination, and ratified the title of the purchaser.

What, then, let it be asked, is essential in the certificate? The answer is, that it should ascertain satisfactorily, in some form or other, those facts which the law deems essential to the transfer of the title of the feme. Those facts are, 1. her privy examination apart from her husband; 2. her knowledge of the nature of the act done; 3. her acknowledgment of the conveyance; 4. her declaration, that that acknowledgment is free and voluntary; and 5. and last, her consent that it may be recorded. If these facts substantially appear, the certificate is good; and though not certified in so many words, if they satisfactorily appear, it will suffice. Now in this case, it is expressly certified, 1. that the feme was privily examined apart from her husband; and 2. that she acknowledged the conveyance of the 320 acres of land contained in the indenture thereto annexed. 3. Her knowledge of the nature of the act she was doing, appears from the certificate that she acknowledged the conveyance of the 320 acres contained in the deed; for how could they certify that fact, unless she knew that that deed did convey that 320 acres? 4. This acknowledgment was made freely and voluntarily; and lastly, she consented it should be recorded.

515 "If this certificate be not sufficient, I fear there are few that are so in the commonwealth. I have examined the records of the circuit and hustings courts here. The following form is that which seems to have prevailed previous to 1819. It was printed at the foot of the printed commission. "Pursuant to the within commission, we did this day examine the within named A. B. privily and apart from her husband, and made known to her the contents of the annexed indenture, when she acknowledged the same to be her act and deed, declaring to us that she did the same freely and voluntarily, without the persuasions or threats of her said husband, and was willing the said deed should be recorded." Here, there is no direct allegation that the deed was shewn to the feme, or that she acknowledged that she signed the same.

I am, then, of opinion, that the deed of October 1803, was duly executed to bar the widow's claim of dower.

I am however of a very different opinion as to the other deed, that of November 1801. For, though the certificate is the same, the fact is not according to the declaration and acknowledgment. When it is certified, that the feme acknowledged the deed, we may safely imply that she acknowledged that she had signed and sealed it, if upon the face of the deed, she appears to have signed and sealed it. But if the writing be in fact signed, without being sealed, her acknowledgment would not prove it to be sealed; and e converso, if it be sealed without being signed, the acknowledgment cannot justify the inference that it was signed, contrary to the express fact. And although we do not require the certificate to be in the express language of the law, neither do we dispense with any part of the law. We only consider the language used, as if it was the very language of the law. The purchaser's case can certainly be no better for its variance from that express language. Now, if the commissioners had followed the law literally, they would not have certified that the wife declared she had willingly signed and sealed, because she had not signed. Or take it to have been so certified; then 516 it is certified that she had *signed, when in fact she had not; so that the certificate or declaration is falsified. It was said, indeed, that this word signing has been here introduced inadvertently.

But of this we are not entitled to judge: ita lex scripta est. It is more probable, that the legislature considered signing a necessary concomitant of every deed or conveyance. I am not prepared to dive into its motives, but if it be true at this day, that deeds are in general to be considered good though not signed, I think it is at least fortunate that in relation to femes covert, an exception to the rule may be inferred. It only remains on this part of the subject, to say, that I do not think the acknowledgment of the seal can be an acknowledgment of a signing, or that the insertion of the name of the feme in the body of the deed, can help the case.

The widow is, I think, clearly entitled to dower in the 300 acre tract, conveyed by the deed of November 1801.

In this view of the case the decree must of course be reversed; and, therefore, an examination whether it did nor did not exclude the improvements in the order to lay off the dower, is unnecessary. On that point, I shall only say, that I think the law very clear, that, in laying off the dower, the improvements made by the purchaser, should be excluded from the estimate, except that improvement in the productive character of the soil which arises from the course of husbandry. In like manner, I am of opinion, that the accession of value arising merely from the progress of society, and the general progressive increase in the value of lands consequent upon increasing wealth and population, cannot be thrown into the scale of the purchaser, or diminish the quantity of land to which the widow will be entitled. But on this point my brethren differ from me.

As to the profits: I have always thought, that, as the alienee is not liable at law for rents and profits, because the statute of Merton copied in the 4th section of our statute of dower, only gave damages where the widow was deforced of lands whereof the husband died seized, so neither ought she to recover them in equity. It

517 seems to me an absurdity, *that in matters of concurrent jurisdiction, there should be different measures of redress in the two courts. It is yet more strange, that when, with a view to affording facilities to the dowress, jurisdiction is entertained of her case, instead of leaving her to her legal remedy against a party claiming a legal title, her remedies should be so vastly enlarged by this assumption of jurisdiction: and it is most of all strange, when the statute limits the damages to one class of cases, and excludes them from another, that a court of equity should repeal or add to the act of the legislature. I do not think there is an adjudged case to justify it, in the case of the alienee. Curtis v. Curtis was cited to prove that equity will go farther than the law in giving a remedy to the dowress: for although at law, the action against the heir as a deforcer, dies with him in respect to the damages, because it is in the nature of a tort, yet in that case, the demand for profits was sustained though the heir died before the decree. But it is to be observed, that the court proceeded mainly on the idea that the dowress brought her suit in the lifetime of the heir, and waived the trespass by bringing her bill in equity; and I am aware of no case in which the bill lies for mesne profits, unless filed before the death of the heir. That cases have been decided in New York, on this point, favorably to the widow, cannot be denied; Swaine v. Perine, 5 Johns. Ch. Rep. 492; Hale v. James, 6 Id. 258. But these cases are not authority for us, where they are neither sustained by the current of decisions of those tribunals from which we have drawn our law, nor are consistent with its acknowledged principles. There is no such current of authorities in favour of the widow's right to profits against the alienee. In Dormer v. Fortescue, 3 Atk. 124, 131, lord Hardwicke, in deciding another point, incidentally mentions the case of a widow, and states that in some cases she will be decreed profits from the time her title accrued; but, even in this incidental remark, he takes a distinction: where the widow cannot proceed at law because of a term that is in her way, 518 the court will give her *profits from the time her title accrued; but where the term is out of her way, and she has no need to come into this court, it would have been otherwise. That is, in effect, the court of equity alone having jurisdiction in the first case, administers relief at its pleasure; but having only concurrent jurisdiction in the latter, it follows the law, and gives profits only as the law would give them. It is proper to add also, that lord Hardwicke does not advert particularly to the case of the alienee. The case of Curtis v. Curtis was a case against the heir as was also the case of Mundy v. Mundy, 2 Ves. jr. 122, and so, I think, we must take Oliver v. Richardson, 9 Ves. 222. There being, then, no direct controlling authority, and the two jurisdictions being concurrent as to this matter, I think the court of equity should follow the law, and give no damages in dower against the alienee, except from the date of the decree.

With these views, I am of opinion to reverse the decree and send the cause back for further proceedings.

Decree reversed, and the cause remanded to the court of chancery for further proceedings, in which dower should be assigned to the appellee of the land conveyed by the deed of her husband which she did not sign, (that of November 1801) according to the value of the land at the date of the deed; and an account should be taken of the profits, from the suing out of the subpoena in the cause.

*Butcher v. Hixton.

Debt on Note—Statute of Limitations—Subsequent Acknowledgment.—In debt upon a promissory note against H. and B.—H. being the principal debtor and B. the surety, and the declaration counting on the note alone.—B. pleads severally, the statute of limitations, the plaintiff replies generally, and issues: Held, that proof of an acknowledgment of the debt by H. the principal, within five years next before the action brought, does not sustain this issue on the plaintiff's part. Same—Same—Same—Declaration.—If in any case of an action of debt on simple contract, the plaintiff would rely on a subsequent acknowledgment to take the case out of the statute of limitations, it seems, he must count on such subsequent acknowledgment in his declaration; otherwise, in an action of assumpsit.

Debt on a promissory note of one Hart and the appellant Butcher to Hixton, brought in May 1826, by Hixton against the makers, in the county court of Randolph. The declaration was in the usual form, alleging the execution of the note by the defendants, and the failure and refusal of both and each to pay the money. The defendants pleaded payment, jointly; and Butcher, severally, pleaded the statute of limitations. The plaintiff replied generally to both pleas, and thereupon issues were made up.

The evidence at the trial, was, 1. the promissory note on which the action was founded; which was a note of Hart and Butcher to Hixton, dated the 26th October 1819, for 126 dollars payable the 15th September 1820, with credit indorsed on it for four dollars paid on the 22nd August 1822; and 2. proof that Hart, within the five years next before the action brought, acknowledged that the debt mentioned in the note was unpaid and justly due; that Hart, however, was now insolvent, though he was solvent at the time the note fell due; and that Hart was the principal debtor, and Butcher was only his surety. And this being all the evidence, Butcher demurred thereto, as not sufficient to maintain the action against him; and the plaintiff joined in the demurrer.

There was a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court on the demurrer to evidence. The county court held that the law on the demurrer was for the plaintiff, and gave him judgment against both defendants. Butcher 520 *appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed the judgment; and then he appealed to this court.

Robinson, for the appellee.

CARR, J. The question is whether the evidence supports the replication of the plaintiff to the plea of the statute of limitations? To my understanding it is clear, that it does not; and this, whether we look at the point in issue upon the pleadings, or the plain words and clear meaning of the statute. This is not an action of assumpsit, but debt; there are no money counts in the declaration; no count of insimul computassent. The single point is, whether the cause of action accrued within five years; and the single cause of action counted on, is the note. Now, how is this point supported by the evidence demurred to? First, there is the promissory note; which, so far from proving that the cause of action accrued within the five years next before the commencement of the suit, proves exactly the reverse. The next evidence is the indorsement on the note. I do not mean to say that this, standing alone, is proof of in an action of debt on a promissory note, the case will not be taken out of the statute of limitations by proof of the new promise unless there is a general indebitatus count in the declaration, the principal case is cited in Bell v. Crawford, 8 Gratt. 123; Farmers Bank v. Clarke, 4 Leigh 609. In this last case, TUCKER, P., said that the principal case was not conceived to go farther than to establish the necessity of bringing assumpsit, or adding a count on indebitatus assumpsit to the declaration in debt, where reliance is to be placed upon an acknowledgment or promise to avoid the bar of the statute of limitations.

BROOKS, J., in Farmers Bank v. Clarke, 4 Leigh 608, 609, said that he concurred in the opinions of the president and JUDGE CARR in the principal case, solely on the ground, that the acknowledgment of Hart, the principal in the note, could not be considered as a waiver of the statute of limitations by Butcher, the surety, and that he did not think it material to decide any other point made in the argument; that the acknowledgment in the principal case, being defective in two respects, as a waiver of the statute, it was unnecessary to decide the question, whether it was within the issue in that case.

JUDGE CARR, in his opinion in Farmers Bank v. Clarke, 4 Leigh 607, said: "It is not necessary to examine the more general proposition discussed in the argument, whether in debt on a promissory note, any subsequent acknowledgment can be resorted to, to take the case out of the statute. However, as the case of Butcher v. Hixton (ante, 519), in which that point was decided, has excited some remark, I shall barely say, that the case was very ably argued; that for myself, I examined it very laboriously; and that on a re-examination, I continue to think the opinion there given correct, whether we take it upon the pleadings, upon the plain meaning of the statutes, upon principle, or upon authority."

See monographic note on "Limitation of Actions" appended to Herrington v. Harkins, 1 Rob. 501.

Statute of Limitations.—Subsequent Acknowledgment.—Sufficiency.—The subsequent promise or acknowledgment, to take a case out of the statute of limitations, ought to be such a one as if declared upon would support an action of itself; that is, it must be an express promise to pay, or such an acknowledgment of a balance then due, unaccompanied by reservations or conditions, as that a jury ought to infer from it a promise to pay. As recognizing this doctrine, cases of Butcher v. Hixton, 4 Leigh 519, and Farmers Bank v. Clarke, 4 Leigh 603, were cited in Aylett v. Robinson, 9 Leigh 45. See also, foot-note to this case.

And in Dingild v. Schoolfield, 32 Gratt. 808, JUDGE BURKS, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "If an acknowledgment is relied on, says JUDGE PARKER, it ought to be a direct and unqualified admission of a present subsisting debt, from which a promise to pay would naturally and irresistibly be implied. Sutton v. Burruss, 9 Leigh 381. If there be an unequivocal admission that the debt is still due and unpaid, unaccompanied by any expression, declaration or qualification indicative of an intention not to pay, the state of facts out of which the law implies a promise is then present, and the party is bound by it. JOHNSON, J., in Young v. Monpoe, 2 Bailey (So. Car.) 278. It is needless to multiply authorities for the proposition stated, but the following may be consulted: Bangs v. Hall, 2 Pick. R. 368; Bally v. Crare, 21 Pick. R. 323; Russell v. Copp, 5 N. Hamp. R. 154; Head's Ex'x v. Warner's Adm'rs, 5 J. J. Marshall R. 255; Peoples v. Mason, 2 Dev. R. 387; Aylett's Ex'or v. Robinson, 9 Leigh 45; Sutton v. Burruss, 9 Leigh 381; Butcher v. Hixton, 4 Leigh 519; opinion of MONCURE, J., in Bell v. Crawford, 8 Gratt. 110."

Same.—Same.—Action on Old Contract.—In Bowles v. Elmore, 7 Gratt. 391, JUDGE MONCURE, delivering the opinion of the court, said that it had long been a vexed question, whether, where a new promise is made to pay a debt barred by the act of limitations, the action might be brought on the old contract. The judge then cites the principal case, and Farmers Bank v. Clarke, 4 Leigh 603, and says that two of the judges in these cases contended that the action should be brought on the new contract; but that the question was not decided in these cases and had never been decided in Virginia. In this case, JUDGE MONCURE left the question till unsettled as it did not affect the case at bar. See the principal case also cited on this point in Bell v. Crawford, 8 Gratt. 123; Horne v. Speed, 2 Pat. & H. 621. In the first of these two cases, it was said that the proviso in the statute of limitations of April 1838, was produced by the opinions expressed by some of the judges in the principal case and Farmers Bank v. Clarke, 4 Leigh 603.

any thing; but taking it as proof of a partial payment, it is relied on to shew an admission, that, at its date, the note was unpaid; and this it does shew; and the plaintiff has also expressly proved, that the defendant Hart, within the five years, admitted that the debt was just and unpaid. But does this support the issue? does it shew that the cause of action accrued within the five years? Assuredly not, unless we can say, that this acknowledgment of the debt does not operate as a new promise, but draws down the original promise to the time of the acknowledgment; and this it is impossible to say, in this action of debt, founded on the promissory note alone. Indeed, there are many cases, in the english books, to shew, that in actions of assumpsit, the subsequent acknowledgment must be taken as a new substantive promise; and this (when I come to cite these 521 cases more particularly) *will shew the distinction in this respect between debt and assumpsit. What says the statute of limitations on this subject? All actions upon the case (other than slander) and all actions of debt grounded on any lending or contract without specialty, shall be commenced and sued within five years next after the cause of such action, or suit, and not after. This statute is taken from that of the 21 Jac. 1, ch. 16, only substituting five years for six. It would seem to me difficult for the legislature to have selected terms more clear and unambiguous, than those used in this law; and yet we shall see, that by the course of judicial legislation pursued by the english courts, they have made them to mean, sometimes one thing, sometimes another, and sometimes nothing at all. Happily, the more recent decisions, are bringing the subject back to the plain common sense of the statute; at least, the judges seem disposed to come as near to it, as the trammels of inveterate practice and precedent, will permit them. With us, there are no such trammels; for I believe this is the first time, that the point now in discussion, has come directly before this court.

I do not know, that I can so well state the course of decision on this subject, as by quotations from some of the able judges who have presided in the english courts, within the last fifteen or twenty years. In A'Court v. Cross, 3 Bing. 329, 11 Eng. C. L. R. 124, chief justice Best says, "I am sorry to be obliged to admit, that the courts of justice, have been deservedly censured for their vacillating decisions on the 21 Jac. 1, ch. 16. When by distinctions and refinements, which, as lord Mansfield says, the common sense of mankind cannot keep pace with, any branch of the law is brought into a state of uncertainty, the evil is only to be remedied by going back to the statute; or if it be in the common law, settling it on some broad and intelligible principle.—The statute says, that actions on the case, account, trespass, debt, detinue, and replevin, shall be brought within six years after the cause of action, and not after. These actions, it will be observed, are mentioned in the same must be brought, is the same in all of them. In all of these except assumpsit, the six years commences from the moment there is a cause of action, and that time cannot be enlarged by any acknowledgment. But in assumpsit, it has been holden, that although six years have elapsed since the debt was contracted, if the debtor promises to pay it within six years, he cannot avail himself of this statute, because this promise, founded on a moral consideration, is a new cause of action. It seems to me, the plaintiff should have been required to declare specially, on this new promise, and ought not to have been permitted to revive his original cause of action, for which the statute expressly declares no action shall be brought. By the present practice, the defendant has not such distinct information as, I think, he is entitled to, that the plaintiff means to avail himself of some promise, to recover a stale demand. The real cause of action is kept intirely out of view, and one that cannot be supported is brought forward. This is inconsistent with what is said to be the intent of special pleadings. The courts however have not stopt here; they have said, acknowledgment of a debt is sufficient, without any promise to pay it, to take the case out of the statute. I cannot reconcile this doctrine either with the words of the statute, or the language of the pleadings. The replication to the plea of non assumpsit infra sex annos, is, that the defendant did undertake and promise within six years. The mere acknowledgment is not a promise to pay it. It has been supposed, that the legislature only meant to protect persons who had paid their debts, but from length of time had lost or destroyed the proofs of payment. From the title of the act to the last section, every word of it shews, that it was not passed on this narrow ground. It is, as I have often heard it called by great judges, an act of peace. Long dormant claims, have often more of cruelty than of justice in them. The legislature thought, that if a demand was not attempted to be enforced within six years, some good

523 excuse for the non-payment *might be presumed, and took away the legal power of recovering it." Again, in Scales v. Jacob, 3 Bing. 638, 13 Eng. C. L. R. 85, the same distinguished judge makes the following sound and excellent remarks: "The two best statutes in our books are, the statute of frauds and the statute of limitations; but, unfortunately, the judges in Westminster hall, have taken a different view of the subject; and, until recently, a struggle seems to have been made to avoid the effect of those statutes. It is curious to observe the progress of opinion on this subject. At first, it seems, the judges were with the statute, and in Dixon v. Thompson, 2 Show. 126, Scroggs, J., and the bar on both sides were agreed, that there must be an express promise to take the case out of it. The same point was ruled, in Bass v. Smith, 12 Vin. Abr. 229, and in Lacon v. Briggs, 3 Atk. 105, it was still held, there must be a promise, although the court considered it somewhat hard. Then, in Hyleing v. Hastings [1 Ld. Raym.

389; Com. Rep. 54], by the opinions of ten judges, after much consultation, it was determined that an acknowledgment of the debt, was at the utmost only evidence from which a promise to pay might be inferred by a jury; but that if a jury found only the bare acknowledgment, it would not be sufficient. After this, equity lawyers came into the courts of common law. Lord Mansfield brought with him into those courts, equitable notions of the statute of limitations; and held that a bare acknowledgment of the debt, even after action brought, would be sufficient to support the action, although not commenced till after the expiration of six years. Lord Loughborough entertained the same opinion. The court of king's bench adhered to it, till ultimately the principle was carried to such a degree of absurdity, that a declaration of a defendant that he would not pay (Dowthwaite v. Tibbut, 5 Mau. & Sel. 75), was holden a sufficient acknowledgment to take the case out of the statute." The judge then states the case of Hellings v. Shaw, 5 Taunt. 608, where the court of common pleas (Gibbs, C. J.) came to a different 524 decision; and refers to, "and approves of all he had himself said in A'Court v. Cross. He then says, "Having disposed of the cases, I come next to the statute. If the language of that is clear, we are especially bound to adhere to it, where there is a conflict among the decisions; and the language of this statute is so clear, that if it were not for the decisions, a doubt would hardly be raised upon it. It has been argued, that the object of the statute was to protect those who had lost the evidences of their payments. This I deny. The title of the act is proof to the contrary; An act, for limitation of actions, and for avoiding suits in law, and the preamble is, For quieting men's estates, and avoiding suits." (See 3 Hen. Stat. at Large 381, our statute of 1705, 4th year of Queen Anne, with a like title, An act for limitation of actions, and avoiding of suits, and the preamble, For avoiding of law suits. And in the revival of 1748, there is the same title and preamble, 5 Id. 513.) The judge proceeds: "After appointing various periods of limitations for other actions, the act provides, that all actions on the case, other than for slander, shall be commenced and sued within six years next after the cause of such actions, and not after. But it has been argued, that by an acknowledgment after the six years, a new cause of action is created, from which a promise may be implied. Yet in ejectments and the other forms of action, besides assumpsit, enumerated in the statute, no acknowledgment after the allotted time will create a new cause of action, although the statute was passed on the same principles with respect to those actions as with respect to assumpsit. It is not a statute to protect parties against loss of evidence, to quiet claims."

There are many cases going to shew, that the old doctrine, that the acknowledgment of a debt was a continuation of the original promise, is exploded. Hurst v. Parker, 1 Barn. & Ald. 92; Green v. Crane, 2 Ld. Raym. 1101; Sarell v. Wine, 3 East

409; Ward v. Hunter, 6 Taunt. 210; 1 Eng. C. L. R. 359; Pittam v. Foster, 1 Barn. & Cress. 248; 8 Eng. C. L. R. 67. In 525 this last case, chief justice Abbott said, "The question is, whether an acknowledgment within six years operates as a new substantive promise, or draws down the original promise to the time when the acknowledgment is made? In Hurst v. Parker, lord Ellenborough says, that in assumpsit, an acknowledgment of the debt is evidence of a fresh promise. If that be not so, but on the contrary the acknowledgment is to have the effect of drawing down the original promise, then in an action by an executor, upon promises made to the testator, evidence of a promise made to the executor would support the issue; but the reverse was decided in Green v. Crane." And he added, that Ward v. Hunter (to the same effect) "was determined at a time when lord chief justice Gibbs presided in the common pleas, than whom, no judge was ever more perfectly acquainted with the rules of pleading."

In Bell v. Morrison, 1 Peters 371, judge Story delivering the opinion of the court, and speaking of the power of a partner, after dissolution, to bind the firm by the acknowledgment of a prior debt, says, "We think the proper resolution of this point, depends upon another, that is whether the acknowledgment or promise is to be deemed a mere continuation of the original promise, or a new contract springing out of and supported by the original consideration? And we think it is the latter, both upon principle and authority."

I must add one more to this list of cases: Tanner v. Smart, 6 Barn. & Cress. 603, 13 Eng. C. L. R. 273, decided by the court of king's bench in 1826. The opinion is delivered by lord Tenterden, and I shall continue to quote his words, because I think it the fairest and most impressive manner of stating the authority. He says, "The action was in assumpsit. Issue was joined upon the statute, and the acknowledgment proved was, I cannot pay the debt at present, but I will pay it as soon as I can. The point, therefore is, whether this is such an acknowledgment as, without proof of any ability on the part of the defendant, takes the case out of the statute?"

526 There are, undoubtedly, "authorities that the statute is founded on the presumption of payment; that whatever repels that presumption, is an answer to the statute, and that any acknowledgment which repels the presumption is, in legal effect, a promise to pay the debt; and that though such acknowledgment is accompanied with only a conditional promise, or even a refusal to pay, the law considers the condition or refusal void, and considers the acknowledgment of itself an unconditional answer to the statute." And after referring to the cases touching this doctrine, he proceeds: "But if there are conflicting authorities upon the point, if the principles, upon which the authorities I have mentioned are founded, appear to be doubtful, and the opposite authorities more consonant to legal rules, we ought to grant a new trial." He then quotes the words of the statute, and proceeds," though this statute puts all these actions upon the same footing, it is only in actions of assumpsit, that an acknowledgment has been held an answer; and when in the case of Hurst v. Parker, it was decided to be inapplicable to actions of trespass, lord Ellenborough gave what appears to be the true reason, that in assumpsit an acknowledgment of the debt is a fresh promise, and that promise is considered as one of the promises laid in the declaration, and one of the causes of action which the declaration states. If an acknowledgment, had the effect, which the cases in the plaintiff's favor attribute to it, one should have expected that the replication to a plea of the statute would have pleaded the acknowledgment in terms, and relied upon it as a bar to the statute; whereas the constant replication, ever since the statute, to let in evidence of an acknowledgment, is, that the causes of action accrued (or the defendant made the promise in the declaration) within six years; and the only principle upon which it can be held to be an answer to the statute, is this, that an acknowledgment is evidence of a new promise, and as such constitutes a new cause of action, and supports and establishes the promises which the declaration states. Upon this principle, whenever the acknowledgment 527 supports any of the *promises in the declaration, the plaintiff succeeds; when it does not support them, (though it may shew clearly, that the debt never has been paid, but is still a subsisting debt) the plaintiff fails." The chief justice then cites and comments on all those cases shewing that an acknowledgment is a new promise; and concludes this point thus: "All these cases proceed upon the principle, that under the ordinary issue on the statute of limitations, an acknowledgment is only evidence of a promise to pay; and unless it is conformable to and maintains the promises in the declaration, though it may shew to demonstration that the debt has never been paid, and is still subsisting, it has no effect."

Therefore, upon the pleadings in the case before us, upon the plain words and meaning of the statute, upon principle, and upon authority, I am clearly of opinion, that the evidence demurred to does not support the issue on the plaintiff's part; and that the judgment ought to be reversed and judgment entered for the appellant.

CABELL and BROOKE, J., concurred in the opinion, that there was nothing to take the case out of the statute of limitations, and that the law on the demurrer to evidence was for the appellant.

TUCKER, P. The question on this demurrer to evidence, which I think it material to consider, is, whether the action of debt on the note can be sustained by evidence of an acknowledgment that it was due, the day of payment of the note, being more than five years before the commencement of the action?

It is laid down, as a general rule, that the statute of limitations must be pleaded, and cannot be given in evidence on the general issue; 4 Bac. Abr. Limitation of actions, F. p. 484; 2 Wm. Saund. 63, a, b. To this rule we have an admitted exception in the action of detinue; and at an early day lord Holt was of opinion, that the action of debt formed another exception, for he thought the statute was proper evidence *under the plea of nil debet.

Draper v. Glassop, Salk. 278. This opinion does not seem to have been universally acquiesced in: 1 Wms. Saund. 283, n, 2; Lindo v. Gardner, 1 Cranch 343; Id. append. 465; Pearsal v. Dwight, 2 Mass. Rep. 87. And it would, perhaps, have been as well that it never had obtained. The importance of requiring the statute to be specially pleaded, is obvious from the surprise to which both plaintiff and defendant are exposed by the contrary course. The plaintiff is met at the trial by the defence of the statute; and the defendant on his part, who makes the defence, is utterly in the dark as to which of the various exceptions to it, the plaintiff may rely upon; whereas if the statute be specially pleaded, the exception must be specially replied; Bogle v. Conway, 3 Call 1. It must be admitted, however, that in Murdock v. Herndon's ex'ors, 4 Hen. & Munf. 200, and in Beattie v. Tabb's adm'rs, 2 Munf. 254, the opinion of lord Holt is strongly countenanced; and in the former judge Roane goes so far as to intimate, that under the plea of nil debet, the effect of the statute might be rebutted by proof of recent acknowledgments. The question not having been debated, and the court not being full, I shall not venture to controvert the principle thus recognized by this court. I shall consider the matter in both aspects, though the defendant in this case has chosen to plead specially; which he ought not to have done if the matter was proper evidence under the general issue; 5 Bac. Abr. Pleas and Pleadings, G. 3, p. 370; Boot v. Wilson, 8 East 311.

First, then, upon the supposition that the statute of limitations must be specially pleaded, it seems to me to be obvious, that a subsequent acknowledgment or promise cannot support the action. Thus, the plea in this case is, that the action did not accrue within five years: what action? the action on the note. Now, if the action on the note did, as is manifest, accrue more than five years before the suit, how can the jury find this issue for the plaintiff, upon the proof that the defendant had subsequently acknowledged the debt

529 *to be due? That subsequent acknowledgment might, indeed, give a new cause of action, and be the foundation of an action of assumpsit; and with or without an express promise to pay, it might be the foundation of another action of debt. But certainly it does not sustain this action of debt. This action of debt rests for its support upon a note, of a certain date and payable at a future time. The proof is of an oral promise at another date, to pay at a different time, for the original day of payment was past. Do the allegata and probata correspond? If a written note, varying from that described in the declaration, in a single cent, or in the day of payment, had been offered in evidence, it must have been rejected as not supporting the action; and though it is admitted that assumpsit on an oral contract may be sustained by an agreement in writing to the same effect, M'Williams v. Willis, 1 Wash. 199, 202, yet it cannot be pretended, that an action of debt on a promissory note, could be sustained by evidence of an oral acknowledgment of debt, or by any express promise by words, to pay the sum demanded in the declaration. I am, therefore, of opinion, that upon this issue, the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the plaintiff's action.

Would the case be materially altered, if we view it, secondly, upon the supposition that the plea had been nil debet? I think not. In that aspect also, the same difficulties would present themselves. The evidence introduced shews the cause of action set forth in the declaration to be barred, and that which is offered to avoid the bar, is an acknowledgment of debt which does not fit or support the declaration. If there had been the most express promise, it would not have sustained it, because the contract therein set forth is not the same, but another. The allegata and probata do not correspond.

It is said, however, that this objection has been made in the english courts, in the action of assumpsit, and overruled; Leaper v. Tatton, 16 East 420. It was well answered, that even in the action of assumpsit the inveterate practice 530 *alone has prevented the court from requiring the plaintiff to declare on the special promise; A'Court v. Cross, 3 Bing. 329; 11 Eng. C. L. R. 126; Upton v. Else, 12 Moore 303; 22 Eng. C. L. R. 451. Besides, there is confessedly a looseness in the action of assumpsit, which, is unknown to the action of debt, and where there are money counts in the declaration, there could be no difficulty in sustaining the action by proof of a subsequent promise, whether it was looked upon a new promise, or as drawing down the original cause of action to the date of the subsequent acknowledgment.

It may perhaps be supposed, that the effect of the subsequent acknowledgment or promise, is not to create a new cause of action, but to revive the old, and to draw it down to the subsequent date. I do not think so. It is obvious, that, in this regard, there is no difference between an acknowledgment of a preexisting debt, and an express promise to pay it. For an acknowledgment of debt as much constitutes a right of action as any promise however express. I shall, therefore, in the following remarks, make no difference between them.

The various and conflicting opinions upon the statute of limitations, form a topic of frequent remark in courts of justice. The attempt to reconcile them would be vain and futile, since they are on all hands conceded to be contradictory. No sooner had the statute passed, than ingenuity began to exert itself, in order to elude its operation. The first attempts were resisted, and an express promise was held necessary. 2 Show. 126; 12 Vin. Abr. Evidence, T. b. 63, pl. 4, p. 229; Hyleing v. Hastings, 1 Ld. Raym. 389. But subsequent decisions seem to have operated, in effect, a repeal of the statute. It had provided, that the actions enumerated should be brought within five years next after the cause of action or suit, and not after: yet the courts decided, that though the action was barred by the statute, it was revived by a new promise; and it must be confessed, that instead of considering the new promise as a new cause 531 *of action, they considered it as reviving the old promise or original cause of action. So far indeed, was the notion carried, that, in the time of lord Mansfield, it was decided, that an acknowledgment of the debt after the commencement of the action, would take it out of the statute; Yea v. Fouraker, 2 Burr. 1099. This leaves no doubt, that the old promise was considered as revived, and the operation of the statute as put out of the way by the acknowledgment. And even to this day, there are many who take this view of the subject. Thus, in Scales v. Jacob, 3 Bing. 638; 13 Eng. C. L. R. 85, 90, Burrough, J., says, that the acknowledgment within six years keeps the debt alive, though he admits that a new promise after six years, creates a new obligation. See also the case of Upton v. Else, before cited. And in Leaper v. Tatton (where the promise was after six years), lord Ellenborough says, "it is the common practice to declare on the original contract, and the only question is, whether the defence given by it has been waived." Moreover, in Dowthwaite v. Tibbut, 5 M. & S. 75, where the defendant acknowledged the debt but refused to pay, the acknowledgment was held sufficient; and must therefore have had the effect of reviving the original debt, since the refusal to pay was certainly no new promise. The same principle is found in Bryan v. Horseman, 4 East 599. And in Jones v. Moore, 5 Binney 582, Brackenridge, J., combats the idea of a new promise being implied, instead of the old cause of action being revived. It cannot be necessary to go into any argument to shew, that these opinions are in the teeth of the statute. The statute declares the action shall not be sustained more than five years after the cause of action accrued; the courts say it shall, provided there be an acknowledgment to take the case out of the statute.

This way of considering the question is not necessary to effectuate the ends of justice; it is in conflict with the forms of the pleadings, which are the best evidences of the law; it jars with acknowledged 532 principles, and is rejected by the *more modern opinions of the courts, which are going back to the doctrines in the time of Shower and lord Raymond.

1. It was unnecessary to violate the statute, by considering the original cause of action as revived. For the subsequent acknowledgment or promise, whether before or after the expiration of five years, was a sufficient ground on which to sustain a new action. Debt or assumpsit might have been sustained; for even the acknowledgment of debt without a promise, is sufficient to support an action of debt, or to sustain an implied promise of payment. And in the action of assumpsit, though the suit may have been brought on the original promise, for instance, on a promissory note, yet the new promise, implied from the acknowledgment of debt, might always be given in evidence under the general counts.

2. The form of the pleading corresponds with this view of the subject. The replication to the plea of the statute is, not that the defendant acknowledged the preexisting debt within five years, which would certainly not be a good plea under the statute, but that he promised within five years; and this averment may be established either by proof of express promise, or by proof of an acknowledgment of debt from which the law implies a promise.

3. The idea of the acknowledgment reviving the original debt, instead of amounting to a new and substantive cause of action, not affected by the statute, jars with indisputable principles. Thus, in assumption against an executor, upon the promise of his testator, evidence of an acknowledgment of the debt by the executor, will not support the action; that is to say, it does not revive the original promise of the testator, but the action can only be sustained upon the executor's promise. Green v. Crane, 2 Ld. Raym. 1101; Ward v. Hunter, 6 Taunt. 210, 11 Eng. C. L. R. 359; Atkins v. Tredgold, 2 Barn. & Cress. 23, 9 Eng. C. L. R. 12; Hickman's ex'ors v. Walker, Willes 27; Sarell v. Wine, 3 East 409; Kinder v. Paris, 2 H. Blacks. 561.

So, where an action was brought against A. and B. and C. *the wife of B. upon a joint note of A. and C. made before her marriage; an acknowledgment of the note by A. after six years, and after the marriage, was not evidence to support the issue; Pittam v. Foster, 1 Barn. & Cress. 248, 8 Eng. C. L. R. 67. Had it revived the original action, it must have been sufficient, but being a new promise, it did not bind C. who was then covert; and, of course, it did not bind B. her husband.

4. The notion of the original cause of action being revived, is negatived by the greater part of the more recent and most respectable authorities. Thus in the last cited case of Pittam v. Foster, chief justice Abbott states the question to be "whether an acknowledgment made within six years, operates as a new substantive promise, or draws down the original promise to the time when the acknowledgment is made." He cites Hurst v. Parker, 1 Barn. & Ald. 93, where lord Ellenborough says, "that in actions of assumption an acknowledgment of the debt is evidence of a fresh promise;" and his own opinion and those of the rest of the court are sustained by that position. In the case of A'Court v. Cross, there was an acknowledgment of debt with an express declaration, "I will never pay it:" the court seems to have been strongly impressed with the embarrassment and difficulties produced by conflicting decisions, and to have desired to settle some principles in that case, which should not be departed from. The chief justice states, that where the debtor promises to pay, he cannot avail himself of the statute, because this promise founded on a moral consideration, is a new cause of action. In Scales v. Jacob, the defendant said, he was not able to pay, but would pay when he could. There was a divided court: but Gazelee, J., and Best, C. J., sustain the position I am contending for; and Burrough, J., admitted it, where the acknowledgment is after six years, but denied it in that case where it was before the bar was complete. "The cases shew," says Gazelee, "that a promise made under such circumstances as the present case, is a new promise, and not a revival of the old one." And the chief justice says, "It is clear that after the six years, the plaintiff has no cause of action, except on the new promise; and that being conditional, the condition attached to it must be observed. The new promise does not bring down the old cause of action, but creates a new one: the form of the pleadings sufficiently indicates this &c." And in Tanner v. Smart, 6 Barn. & Cress. 603, 13 Eng. C. L. R. 273, lord Tenterden, delivering the judgment of the whole court, declares that an acknowledgment is no answer to the statute, except in actions of assumption; and moreover, that it does not revive the old promise but is evidence of a fresh promise.

The same opinions are well sustained by chief justice Tilghman in Jones v. Moore, 5 Binney 576. See also Roosevelt v. Marks, 6 Johns. Ch. Rep. 266, 290, citing Danforth v. Culver, 11 Johns. Rep. 146; Laurence v. Hopkins, 13 Id. 288; Sands v. Gelston, 15 Id. 511.

I am, upon the whole, clearly of opinion, that the acknowledgment has the effect of creating a new promise, and does not revive the old one; and if so, it seems obvious that an action of debt upon the old contract, which is barred, cannot be sustained by proof of the new promise. Indeed, it is very clearly stated in two of the cases cited, that the doctrine of taking a debt out of the statute by subsequent acknowledgment only applies to cases of assumption; 13 Eng. C. L. R. 93, 375, 11 Eng. C. L. R. 126.

The other points in the case it is not necessary to discuss as this is fatal to the plaintiff's demand.

Judgment reversed, and judgment entered for the appellant.

535 Sydnor v. Gee, Sheriff &c.*

Sale of Chattels—Redelivery to Vendor upon Bailment

—Effect.—An absolute bill of sale of slaves is executed by B. to C. for valuable consideration, and the slaves are delivered by vendor to vendee: and then vendee hires the slaves to vendor, for their victuals and clothes, taxes and levies, till the end of the ensuing year: the sale, and the hiring are both bona fide transactions: at the end of the year, vendee takes possession of the slaves, holds them for several years, and then dies: a creditor of vendor recovers judgment against him, after vendee has taken possession of the slaves, and levies his execution on the slaves in the hands of vendee's executor: Held, in a controversy between such creditor of the vendor and the executor of the vendee, that the slaves are the property of the vendee's estate, and not subject to execution at the suit of such creditor of the vendor. Same—Same—Same—Fraud Per Se.—It seems, that,

Sale of Chattels—Retention of Possession by Vendor—Fraud Per Se.—In foot-note to Davis v. Turner, 4 Gratt. 423, it is shown that, while the doctrine of fraud per se as laid down in Edwards v. Harben, 3 T. Rep. 587, was approved by many early Virginia decisions, later cases introduced various excep-in the case of an absolute sale and delivery of chattels, and an immediate redelivery thereof by vendee to vendor, upon bailment, for a limited time, on valuable consideration, both transactions being in fact fair, such bailment of vendee to vendor is not inconsistent with the sale, so as to make the sale fraudulent per se, within the rule of Edwards v. Harben, 2 T. R. 587.

Same—Immediate Possession by Vendee Unnecessary.†

—If an absolute sale of chattels, fair in itself, be not accompanied and followed by immediate possession, but possession is taken by the vendee before the rights of any creditor of the vendor attaches, the sale is good against the vendor's creditors.

Sydnor sued out a writ of fieri facias on a judgment of the county court of Mecklenburg, against Baptist, and delivered it to Gee, the sheriff of the county, who levied it on three slaves, named John, Rachel and Nancy, as the property of Baptist; but a doubt arising whether the slaves were the property of Baptist, or of the estate of A. Clausell deceased, and Clausell's executor forbidding the sale, the sheriff required of Sydnor, and he gave, an indemnifying bond, with one Cunningham his surety, according to the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 25, 6, 7, pp. 533, 4, and thereupon two of the slaves were sold to satisfy Sydnor's execution.

And then an action of debt, on the indemnifying bond, founded on the statute, was brought by Gee, the sheriff, at the relation and for the benefit of Clausell's executor, against Sydnor and Cunningham, in the circuit court of Mecklenburg. The declaration set out the condition of the 536 the *bond, and alleged as the breach thereof, that the three slaves taken and sold to satisfy Sydnor's execution against Baptist, were the property, not of Baptist, but of the relator. Plea, conditions performed; and issue. At the trial, the defendants demurred to the evidence, and the plaintiff joined in the demurrer. The evidence set out in the demurrer was as follows:

1. Sydnor's fi. fa. against Baptist (by the return upon which, it appeared, that it was levied upon the three slaves before mentioned, and that two of them John and Nancy were sold to satisfy the execution) and the indemnifying bond on which the action was founded.

2. An absolute bill of sale, executed by Baptist to A. Clausell, in his lifetime, dated the 9th November 1821, and recorded tions, and modifications, and finally, in Davis v. Turner, the whole doctrine was repudiated. The principal case has been cited by several later cases as a modification of, or exception to, the doctrine of Edwards v. Harben. Several subsequent cases, in discussing this doctrine, review with approval the decision in the principal case. See Lewis v. Adams, 6 Leigh 327, 332, 339; Mason v. Bond, 9 Leigh 185; Tavenner v. Robinson, 2 Rob. 286; Davis v. Turner, 4 Gratt. 422, 455, 456; Bindley v. Martin, 28 W. Va. 798. In his dissenting opinion in Lewis v. Adams, 6 Leigh 336, 337, CABELL, J., distinguishes the principal case from the case at bar; and discusses the question as to grounds on which the decision in the principal case turned—whether on the resumption of possession by the vendee before the rights of creditors attached; or on the manifest fairness of the original transaction, which was attended with delivery.

*Same—Immediate Possession by Vendee Unnecessary.—Under a bona fide sale of chattels, though there is no delivery of possession at the time of sale, yet if the vendee gets possession before the rights of any creditor attaches, the sale is good against the vendor's creditors. Poling v. Flanagan, 41 W. Va. 200, 23 S. E. Rep. 689, citing the principal case and McKinley v. Ensell, 2 Gratt. 333.

in the county court of Mecklenburg on the 30th October 1822, whereby Baptist, in consideration of 850 dollars, conveyed to Clausell, a female slave and her children, among which were the three slaves, on which Sydnor's execution was levied; on which bill of sale the following writing was indorsed—"This day the within named M. Baptist gave and delivered to the within named A. Clausell, the within mentioned slaves [naming them] in the presence of us, as witness our hands, the 7th December 1821. (signed) M. Baptist, [the vendor]—J. Clausell and M. Brand," [the witnesses]. And it was proved by two of the subscribing witnesses to the bill of sale, that the above writing indorsed thereon was, in fact, executed on the same day on which the bill of sale was executed, though the dates appeared to differ.

3. Evidence, that Baptist, before the execution of the bill of sale was indebted by bond to Clausell in the sum of 1280 dollars; and that the slaves in the bill of sale mentioned were sold by Baptist to Clausell, at a fair valuation by indifferent persons, for 850 dollars, in part satisfaction of that debt; and a credit for that sum was indorsed by Clausell, on the bond; this credit being of the same date as the bill of sale.

537 *4. Articles of agreement under seal, between Clausell and Baptist, of even date with the bill of sale (namely, the 9th November 1821), and attested by the same subscribing witnesses; whereby it was witnessed, that Clausell hired all the slaves in the bill of sale mentioned to Baptist, from that date till the 1st of January 1823; in consideration of which Baptist obliged himself to find them victuals and clothes during the term, and to pay all taxes and levies upon them.

5. The evidence of witnesses (who were the witnesses to the bill of sale) that Baptist, immediately on the execution of the bill of sale at Baptist's house, the slaves being then present, said to Clausell, "Here are the negroes; they are your property;" that the witnesses of the transaction then went away, leaving Baptist and Clausell together, and the slaves also there, and did not know whether Clausell removed the slaves at that time or not; that Clausell lived during the year 1822 at Baptist's house, Baptist's wife being Clausell's sister: that about Christmas 1822, Clausell removed all the slaves to his own land in the neighbourhood: that Clausell held possession of them all, from that time till his death in December 1826, except one which he sold, and another which he hired to Baptist in the year 1825, as a nurse for his child: that Clausell, from the date of the bill of sale, listed the slaves on the books of the commissioner of the revenue, as his property: that during the years 1823, '24 and '25, Baptist having dissipated his property, lived on Clausell's land, as his overseer; and the slaves mentioned in the bill of sale worked there under Baptist as the overseer, until 1825, during which year he was dismissed; and the slaves, thenceforth, remained in the exclusive possession of Clausell; and after his death in December 1826, all of them, except the one which he had sold, remained in possession of his executor until they were taken by the sheriff under Sydnor's execution against Baptist.

6. The will of A. Clausell, whereby he bequeathed the slaves to a legatee.

538 *7. The defendant then adduced evidence, that Baptist was, at the time of the execution of the bill of sale to Clausell, indebted beyond what he was worth, and all the other slaves he then held in his possession, being only three, were mortgaged for debt; and that the debt due by him to Sydnor, for which the judgment was recovered on which Sydnor's execution was sued out, was contracted before the bill of sale to Clausell was executed.

There was a verdict for the plaintiff for 550 dollars with interest &c. The circuit court held, that the law on the demurrer to evidence was for the relator, and gave the plaintiff judgment, for his benefit; from which Sydnor appealed to this court.

Leigh, for the appellant.

CARR, J. No question has been raised, in the argument at the bar, and none could have been raised, as to the fairness, in point of fact, of the transaction as between Baptist and Clausell; nor was it denied, that the sale of the slaves by the former to the latter, was an actual sale, and, as between the parties, valid and effectual. But it was contended for the appellant, that possession did not accompany and follow the deed of Baptist to Clausell; that the sale was, therefore, fraudulent in law, as to the creditors of Baptist, according to the rule of Edwards v. Harben, 2 T. R. 587, and that Sydnor, as a creditor, had a clear right to levy his execution on the property. On the other hand, it was contended for the appellee, that as the sale from Baptist to Clausell was in itself a real and fair transaction, so the possession was at no time inconsistent with the bill of sale; but if it was so at any time, that the taking of possession by the vendee, and holding the property more than four years, had removed all ground for imputing fraud to the sale, before Sydnor was in a situation to assert any claim against Baptist. Let 539 us then, inquire, 1. Whether the possession of Baptist under *the hiring, was so inconsistent with the deed as to bring the case within the rule of Edwards v. Harben? 2. Does this rule comprehend a case where the possession, though not taken immediately, was taken and held under the deed, for years before any creditor obtained a lien by judgment?

I have heretofore expressed my view of the rule of Edwards v. Harben. and have no idea of going over that ground again. It must be recollected, that this is a demurrer to evidence, where the court must make all such inferences in favor of the party, whose case is taken from the jury, as the jury might fairly have made. It is admitted by all the cases, that possession remaining with the vendor, is but evidence of fraud which may be explained away. Now, suppose this case had gone to the jury upon this evidence; might not the jury have concluded from the evidence, that the bill of sale was executed upon an actual sale for a valuable consideration? that there was a real delivery of the slaves, and a true and actual hiring of them for twelve months to the vendor; that the woman being a breeder, and the children small, were, really and bona fide, worth no more than their victuals, clothes, taxes and levies; that at the end of the year, the vendee resumed possession of the slaves, carried them to his own farm, and kept and used them as his own, till the day of his death, without a single claim from the vendor, or the assertion of any claim by any creditor of the vendor; and that he bequeathed them by his will, as his own property, never dreaming that any creditor of his vendor would set up a claim to take them: might not, nay, must not the jury, I ask, have drawn these conclusions from the evidence in the record? I really think so, and feel that as taking their place, I ought to do the same. And viewing the case in this light, it seems to me, that the possession continuing with the vendor, is explained, and shewn to be consistent with the deed; to be, in truth, the possession of the vendee; for, if the vendee had fairly bought and paid for the slaves, and they had been delivered, they were to all intents and purposes his own; he might sell them, 540 hire them, *send them to Africa; you cannot restrict him in exercising the rights of ownership; you cannot say, he might hire to others, but not to his vendor. The hiring was just as open and public here as the purchase.

Then, as to the second point, Can we say that this case is within the rule? that the transaction was calculated to defraud, hinder or delay, the creditors of Baptist? As between the parties, many cases decide that the bill of sale is good, if for valuable consideration, though not accompanied by possession; Steel v. Brown, 1 Taunt. 380; Kidd v. Rawlinson, 2 Bos. & Pull. 59; Robinson v. M'Donnell, 2 Barn. & Ald. 134; Thomas v. Soper, 5 Munf. 28. And where was the creditor, who, at the date of the bill of sale, could question any sale which Baptist might choose to make of his property? Not the appellants, for they were then and for a long time after creditors at large. Suppose at the time of this sale, Baptist had sold every slave he owned to traders for the southern market, who were about to take them directly out of the state, could these appellants have stopped them? If the cases are examined, it will be found, that, in not one of them, has a creditor been heard to contest a conveyance, whose right did not attach while the property remained with the vendor. In Steel v. Brown, Steel sold Cockburne the lease and fixtures of a public house, received £200. in part, took his notes for the balance, and put the house and goods into his possession, taking a bill of sale of the fixtures and goods for his security: after about nine months, Cockburne becoming embarrassed in his affairs, Steel took possession of the goods: Brown had lent Cockburne the £200. which he paid to Steel in part for the purchase, and had taken an assignment of the lease, and a judgment acknowledged by Cockburne: after Steel took the goods into possession, Brown had his execution levied on them as the property of Cockburne, and immediately apprised Steel of what he had done, and Steel brought trover against him: at the trial, the defendant failed in proving his judgment, and the plaintiff 541 obtained a judgment: Vaughan, *sergeant, moved for a new trial, on the ground that inasmuch as Cockburne had remained in possession of the goods for a considerable time after executing the bill of sale, the plaintiff had no title to them, nor any legal possession, under that instrument; and he cited Edwards v. Harben. The court were clearly against the new trial. One ground was, that the defendant had notice of the plaintiff's lien, as was proved by his giving him notice of his levy on the goods. But Mansfield, C. J., further remarks, "No case has decided, that a bill of sale unaccompanied by possession, may not under certain circumstances be fair and valid. If one executes even a colorable bill of sale for a valuable consideration, though the vendor remains some time in possession, it is a good bill as between the parties. All that has been said about the transaction relates to third persons: but in the present case, if the defendants had proved themselves to be creditors, which they failed to do, it is very doubtful, whether they could have been in a better situation than they now are, on account of the communication, which appears to have been made, at the time of the transfer of the lease." Lawrence, J., said, "I am of the same opinion. A bill of sale is good as between the parties to it, though no possession is taken at the time when it is executed. The case of Edwards v. Harben is good law, but not applicable here; that was the case of creditors." Here we find, that though it made a part of the case stated, that the defendants lent Cockburn £200. yet, because they failed to shew themselves judgment creditors, they were denied the right to contest the fairness of the bill of sale, under the rule of Edwards v. Harben; and very correctly, it seems to me; for how could the sale be in fraud of those, who had no right to object to any sale the owner might choose to make? So in the case before us: Suppose during the year that Baptist held the slaves on hire, he had sold and delivered them to a stranger; could these appellants have objected? or after they obtained their judgment, could they have taken the slaves in execution? And if Baptist might 542 by this *fraud upon his vendee Clausell, have extinguished all claim of the appellants upon the slaves, must not the effect be the same, when at the end of the year, he delivered them up to Clausell? thereby putting his seal anew to the bill of sale. Suppose the bill of sale thrown out of view, and that Clausell had, at its date, bought the slaves and paid the money, and at the close of the year 1822, Baptist had, in consideration thereof, delivered up the slaves to Clausell; surely, this would have been good against all creditors whose rights were not then so perfected as to enable them to object to a sale out and out. The case of Bartlett v. Williams, 1 Pick. 288, is directly in point: it was argued with great research, and the opinion is, I think, a very sensible one. The judge observes, "It is certainly a general rule, that possession must follow and accompany the deed; and that the possession of the vendor after the bill of sale, unexplained, would render the conveyance void, as against creditors. But such a possession may be explained, as in the case of Kidd v. Rawlinson, and be perfectly consistent with justice. Such possession may also be consistent with the terms of the deed. The doctrine in the case &c. of Edwards v. Harben is unquestionably sound. But there, the vendee did not obtain possession under the bill of sale, before the right of the creditors of the vendor accrued." The judge also cites the case of Robinson v. M'Donnell, as bearing on the question, and I cannot but think that it has a pretty strong bearing; for though it was a case of bankruptcy, and came more immediately within the statute of the 21 Jac. 1, yet the two statutes are nearly related, being in pari materia, both for the protection of creditors; and it is natural when the one is under discussion, for the mind to advert to the other. In that case, Bayley, J., says, "Where there is a deed executed, under which it is competent for a party to take possession immediately, and he does not do so in six months, I am not aware of any case, which decides that such omission would be fraudulent, so as to make the deed void, under the statute of Elizabeth. If indeed the right of any third persons had intervened, it might be void as against them."

543 *The case of Williamson v. Farley, Gilm. 15, was relied on. I consider it materially different from this. There, the lien of the third person attached, while the possession of the vendor continued: there too, the vendee, though he had taken a bond, purporting that the slaves were hired for a year, and were to be delivered at the end of it, took possession of them in less than a month, thereby disaffirming the contract of hire. I am for affirming the judgment.

CABELL, J. I am for affirming the judgment, upon the ground that the vendee, Clausell, took possession of the property before the rights of the creditor attached. But for this, I should be for reversing it; for if there had been no such resumption of possession, I should have been clearly of opinion, that the case would come within the rule of Edwards v. Harben.

BROOKE, J. I also am of opinion, that the judgment should be affirmed.

TUCKER, P. The demurrer to evidence, filed by the defendant (the appellant here), presents, as is supposed, the single question, whether possession accompanied and followed the deed from Baptist to Clausell? If it did, within the meaning of the principle established by the case of Edwards v. Harben, and the numerous other cases of the same class, the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

In the examination of this case, I shall assume, that the transaction was in point of fact fair and bona fide; that Clausell was a fair creditor, Baptist a real debtor, and the transaction honestly designed for the payment of a just debt, in property at a fair valuation. I shall also assume, that the delivery was with no actual covinous intent, but that it was bona fide, and that the hiring from Clausell to Baptist was also a bona fide transaction. The facts set forth in the demurrer sustain this view of the case; but if they were more doubtful, we should be bound to infer them, because the *jury might fairly have done so; and the defendant having withdrawn these inquiries, from the appropriate tribunal, cannot complain of the most favorable inferences being made by the court, in behalf of his adversary.

The defence, indeed, is, that, however fair the transaction may have been in point of fact, and however good and valuable the consideration, the deed is void, because it was unaccompanied by delivery of the possession. This defence must rest upon one of two grounds; either that there was no delivery when the deed was made, or that the delivery which was made, followed by the redelivery to Baptist on hire, was not a valid delivery.

There is some difficulty as to the date at which the deed was acknowledged. Take it, as was suggested at the bar, that the deeds were prepared on the 9th November, but were not executed until the 7th December following. The indorsement of that date, and the testimony, establish its execution then; and the witness further proves that, immediately thereupon, Baptist said to Clausell, the slaves being then present, "here are the negroes; they are your property." The witnesses then went away and left the slaves and Clausell there, and did not know that they were removed at that time. They were not removed, in fact; but a more express delivery cannot be established, unless it be rendered nugatory by the failure to remove them, or by the subsequent hiring. Whether, under the circumstances of the conflicting dates, and the relationship between the parties, the defendant might have successfully assailed the transaction before the jury, is not the question. That the transaction was bona fide, might very fairly have been inferred by the jury, from the consideration given, and the other circumstances proved, and we must accordingly infer it.

But it is contended, that the slaves were left in Baptist's possession for more than a year. If the case turned upon this, it would have been a sufficient answer to this objection, that Clausell also lived with Baptist during the same time. It was enough that they staid where their master staid. *It would be a forced inference, that my slave, who lives where I live, is in the possession of my landlord, and not in my possession. This court has, in a very strong case, considered otherwise. In Braxton v. Gaines, 4 Hen. & Munf. 151, Braxton having received £100. for his daughter, gave her in lieu of it a negro woman; she and her slave continued to reside in her father's family, and her father even included the slave in a mortgage to certain creditors: yet her rights were sustained against them. But, in this case, there was an express hiring, immediately after the delivery to Clausell under the bill of sale. It was a hiring by deed executed on the same day. Now, this hiring must, upon the demurrer to evidence, be taken to be bona fide. It presents, then, this question: is the sale of a slave fraudulent per se, because the vendee at the time of the purchase and delivery of possession, hires the slave to the vendor, even though that hiring be in fact bona fide and for a fair consideration? I apprehend not. The transaction may, indeed, as between friends and relations, suggest a suspicion of unfairness; but if it be a real and not a covinous transaction, the delivery would exempt it from the legal inference of fraud.

While I accede without difficulty to the doctrines, as I understand them, on this subject, I cannot but remark, that, however salutary they may be, I see no propriety in the exercise of our astuteness in applying them for the purpose of avoiding a fair transaction. It is better to follow the suggestion of lord Mansfield, that "the statute of frauds ought not to be construed to make innocent parties sufferers;" Cadogan v. Kennett, 2 Cowp. 432.

Where, indeed, possession does not accompany and follow the deed, where the vendor's possession and enjoyment is uninterrupted, or where the delivery, though ostensible, appears to have been only colourable, the transaction, according to all the cases, is fraudulent per se. But, if there be such delivery as the nature of the transaction admits, and if that delivery be real and not colourable, then the case is not within the influence of

Edwards v. Harben. Thus, where the situation of the property is such as to preclude the actual delivery; where it is not so in the power of the vendor as that he can give, or so in reach of the vendee as that he can receive, the possession; the want of delivery does not constitute fraud, provided the vendee takes possession as soon as it can be had. Such is the case of a ship at sea; such the case of the sale of a runaway slave; or of the purchase of goods in a warehouse, and receiving the key; or of the purchase of coals in bulk, or lumber in quantity, lying on the bank of a canal, or of the purchase of a sick slave; 5 Rand. 216, or of a horse in the country which I am to send for tomorrow; Ibid. All these are cases which do not come within the principle; because such possession is delivered as the transaction admits of. It is not that the rule is impaired; it is that the case does not come within it.

Admitting the rule, then, in its most unqualified terms, as establishing the law, there is always a previous question to be settled; the question of fact, whether there was such delivery as the nature of the case admitted of, and was that delivery real and bona fide? Hardaway v. Manson, 2 Munf. 230. If there was, then is the transaction good; if not, then it is bad. But this question of fact cannot be settled by any fixed and determinate rule. It depends upon the nature of each transaction, and must vary accordingly.

I have said, that in the inquiry as to the fact of delivery, it is essential it should appear, that it was real and bona fide. For if a delivery is only colourable, it is void. And whether colourable or not, is also a question of fact. In like manner, where a delivery is proved, and the property is redelivered to the vendor, upon whatever terms, the question presented, is a question of fact; was the delivery to the vendee real and bona fide, or only colourable and collusive? If the latter, it is fraud per se; if the former, it is valid and effectual. For, though there be an immediate redelivery upon a new contract (for instance, a contract for hire) yet *this does not avoid the delivery by the vendor, I conceive, provided the redelivery on hire, be a real and bona fide transaction. If, indeed, it be covinous and collusive, then the delivery itself is infected; it is naught; it is void; and the case falls directly within the influence of the rule of fraud per se.

Innumerable instances might be presented of delivery and redelivery, which the common sense of every man must admit to be unassailable. I buy a horse from a countryman, and the seller immediately borrows him to save himself the fatigue of going home afoot. I buy a slave in midsummer, which I shall not want till Christmas, while the vendor wishes to keep him to finish his crop, and I hire him for the residue of the year to my vendor for a fair price. I invest my money in a lease for 99 years of a house, not for residence, but for the purpose of renting; and I immediately redemise it to my assignor for a year. I invest 10,000 dollars in slaves, not to till my land, but to be let to hire: I make purchases, and on the completion of each purchase, I hire the slave to his former master. Can it be, that in these various transactions, so common in the concerns of life, that the purchaser is affected with constructive fraud, and must lose the benefit of his purchase? I think not. The mischiefs of the rule would be greater than the frauds at which it is aimed, if it be permitted to insinuate itself into such transactions as those. While the rule is admitted to be inflexible, the question whether there has been a bona fide delivery, must depend in every case upon its own peculiar circumstances.

The case of Williamson v. Farley, Gilm. 15, cannot, perhaps, be reconciled with these principles, unless upon the ground that the taking possession of the slaves by Farley, within the year for which they were hired, was evidence that the hiring was only colourable and collusive. That is certainly a strong feature in the case; but even with this, it seems to me to have gone very far. No reasons were given, however, for the opinion of the court, nor does it appear whether the case was argued or not.

548 *The case of Edwards v. Harben was not the case of a sale and a subsequent bailment. The deed was an absolute sale on its face, but was intended as a security only, according to which character, possession would have been held by the debtor. The creditor refused to accept it, unless he was permitted to take possession in fourteen days. This is an express negative of his right before, and shewed the inconsistency of the real transaction with the deed.

It was contended, however, very strongly, that to recognize an immediate redelivery upon hire, is to provide a legal method of effectuating such a fraud; and that if there be such immediate hiring, it ought to appear upon the deed as part of the transaction. There might be yet more force in this argument, if fraud would be defeated by the avoidance of the contract of hire when contemporary with the deed. The objection could certainly not avail, if there was an actual interruption of the vendor's possession for a month, a week, or even a day. And yet a redelivery upon hire within a short period, would be as much calculated to deceive the creditor, as if it were immediate. It would be indeed vain, to attempt so to arrange the possession of personal property, as altogether to prevent frauds upon purchasers and creditors. Some circumspection and vigilance must be demanded of them. Caveat emptor is the rule which applies to them. If I lend a man a horse to ride to Kentucky, and he sells him on the journey, it is the buyer's loss. If I lend my slave to my son for any period less than five years, and he sells him, it is the buyer's loss. If I hire a slave to a man at a distance and he sells him, it is the buyer's loss. On either side, there is an evil to be avoided; and the most common transactions of life, and the ordinary sales of personal estate, will be trammelled and embarrassed, if our sole care is directed to the protection of creditors and purchasers, who ought to protect themselves.

Nor would the case be altered by making the contract of hire part of the instrument of sale. That instrument is never recorded.

It is in the pocket of the vendee, and 549 *never seen by the creditor. It cannot, therefore, give him any notice of the real character of the transaction. If the witnesses to the sale are witnesses also of the hiring, as in this case, the same evidence is afforded to the creditor of both acts.

Applying these principles to the case, and taking the transaction to be bona fide in all its parts, I am clearly of opinion, that there was a valid delivery, and that the effect of it was not destroyed by the immediate redelivery to Baptist on a new contract of hire. After the termination of that contract, they were taken into Clausell's own possession, and so continued until they were taken by execution; which confirms the fairness of the whole transaction, and proves that it was a real and not a colourable sale.

According to the view I have taken of the case, it is unnecessary to examine the interesting question, which has been so ably argued, as to the effect of the subsequent acquirement of possession by the vendee upon intervening rights of third persons. This question has been touched by one of the judges of this court in Clayton v. Anthony, 6 Rand. 305, and by another in Batton v. Glasscock, Id. 78, and is mentioned and waived, in the recent case of Shields v. Anderson, 3 Leigh 735, 7. But it may not be amiss to say, that it is strongly my impression, that the failure to deliver possession, where there is no real fraud intended, does not attach fraud to the transaction forever; and that a subsequent delivery will make it valid and effectual against all creditors, whose debts are contracted, and all purchasers whose bargains are made after such subsequent delivery. The taking possession will at least make it the same thing as if the deed was then made; see the remarks of Bayley, J., in Jones v. Dwyer, 15 East 27, 8. Farther than this I am not disposed at this time to go; but shall be free to reexamine the question in other aspects, whenever it shall again arise.

Roanes v. Archer.

May, 1838.

Husband and Wife—Settlement for Use of—Liability for Husband's Debts.—Real and personal estate settled by deed, to the use and benefit of R. and E. his wife, during their joint lives, and if R. should survive E. his wife, then to his use during his life, and after his death to the children of R. by E. his wife: HELD, the joint interest of husband and wife during their joint lives, is not subject to the husband's debts; but his contingent interest in case he should survive his wife, is subject to his debts.

Deed—Acknowledgment after Lapse of Statutory Period—Effect—Re-execution.—A deed dated in April 1804, and the execution thereon attested by witnesses, is not recorded within eight months from its date; but, in April 1806, the grantor acknowledges the deed in open court, and upon such acknowledgment it is ordered to be recorded: HELD, upon the construction of the statute of conveyances of 1792, 1 Old Rev. Code, ch. 90 § 1, 4, such acknowledgment of the deed in court is to be taken as a re-delivery and re-execution of the deed, so as to make it a deed as of the date of such acknowledgment, and so the deed is well recorded within eight months from the time of the execution, and is valid as against the grantor's creditors.

By indenture, dated the 6th April 1804, between William Royall of the first part, James Roane of the second part, and John Archer and John Royall, trustees of the third part,—reciting that Roane was indebted to William Royall in the sum of £2000. by bond dated in September 1787, and William Royall was desirous of bestowing this money on the children of Roane by Elizabeth his wife, who was the nearest relation of Royall, and had agreed to give up the bond to Roane to be cancelled, in consideration that Roane would settle certain lands and slaves, in the manner after mentioned, on his children by his said wife,—therefore, Roane conveyed to the trustees, and the survivor of them, and the heirs &c. of the survivor, a parcel of land in Charles City, and twenty four slaves; upon trust, 1. for the use and benefit of Roane and Elizabeth his wife, during their joint lives; 2. if Roane should survive his wife, then to his use during his life; and 3. after his death, to the use of his present and any future children by his said wife; with power to Roane to appoint the subject to and among or to such of his children, as he should think proper—And Royall, on his part, released to Roane the debt due him by the bond of 1787.

551 This deed was executed by Roane and his wife and the two trustees, and there were five subscribing witnesses to their execution of it; it was not executed by William Royall. It was not recorded within eight months after its date, according to the provisions of the statute of conveyances of 1792. But it was admitted to record by the county court of Charles City, at its April term 1805, by an order in these words: "The aforewritten indenture, in trust, between James Roane and Elizabeth his wife, John Archer and John Royall, was this day, in open court, acknowledged by James Roane, and as to him ordered to be recorded, and continued as to the rest."

William Archer, the appellee, having recovered a judgment against James Roane for 600 dollars, sued out a fieri facias thereon, which was levied on some of the slaves mentioned in the deed of trust, then in Roane's possession.

Whereupon, Elizabeth the wife of Roane, by her next friend, and their children, exhibited a bill against William Archer, the creditor, in his own right and as administrator of John Archer the surviving trustee, and James Roane; setting forth, the deed of trust of April 1804; and setting forth also, that James Roane was, in fact, as recited in the deed, justly indebted to their kinsman William Royall in the sum of £2000. by the bond of September 1787, 552 and *that it being his design to give Mrs. Roane and her children the benefit of the money, Roane on his part, in consideration that he would release the debt to him, agreed to settle the property in the deed mentioned as therein provided, so that this was the real consideration of the deed; insisting, that the slaves settled by the deed, were not liable to be taken in execution and sold for James Roane's debts; and praying an injunction to inhibit the sheriff from proceeding to sell the slaves he had taken to satisfy Archer's fieri facias.

The injunction was awarded.

William Archer, answering in his own right, said, he knew nothing of the deed of trust mentioned in the bill, but from the recital of its provisions therein contained; and he insisted, that James Roane, his debtor, held by the deed a life estate in the slaves thereby settled which was justly subject to execution for his debts.

*1 Old Rev. Code, ch. 90, § 1, 4. Pleasants's ed. p. 157.

The 1st section provides, "that no estate of inheritance &c. in lands or tenements, shall be conveyed from one to another, unless the conveyance be declared by writing sealed and delivered; nor shall such conveyance be good against a purchaser for valuable consideration, not having notice thereof, or any creditor, unless the same writing be acknowledged by the party or parties who shall have sealed and delivered it, or be proved by three witnesses to be his, her, or their act, before the general court, or court of the district, county or corporation, in which the land or some part thereof lieth, or in the manner herein after directed, within eight months from the time of selling and delivering, and be lodged with the clerk of such court to be there recorded."

And the 4th section provides, that "all deeds of trust and mortgages whatsoever, which shall hereafter be made and executed, shall be void as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers, unless they shall be acknowledged or proved, according to the directions of this act"—Note in Original Edition.

shall shew it by some extracts from the arguments at the bar, and the opinion of the court. Mr. Call and Mr. Marshall both argued, most elaborately, to prove that there may be a redelivery of the same deed; but observe the particular ground, on which they place this reexecution, as to the facts—Mr. Call says, "But it will be said, this was not a new deed, but a mere re-acknowledgment of the old one, which, according to the chancellor's reasoning, can mean nothing more than an acknowledgment, that it was delivered the day of its first date. This position is never true; because when it is reacknowledged, the grantor repeats the ceremony, and says in the presence of the witnesses, that he acknowledges it to be his seal, and delivers it as his act and deed. So that it is in fact, always, an act of the day of its reacknowledgment. But, however true the position may be in general, it is certainly not so, in this particular case: because the grantor here, has actually caused the real date of the reacknowledgment to be noted by the witnesses, thereby manifesting his design that it should be considered an act of that day." Now, I ask, do the facts here stated, and the arguments drawn from them, apply in the slightest degree, to a simple acknowledgment in court in order to have the deed recorded? Assuredly not. See, then, a few remarks of Mr. Marshall: "It is said, however, that the reacknowledgment was no delivery. But for what purpose was it made then? Certainly, the intention

559 was to deliver; *and here the evidence is express, that it was delivered on the date of the last acknowledgment." Here, again, is a case stated wholly different from the one at bar. Let us turn now to the opinion of the court; and here, I must admit, that the criticism of the counsel on my construction of the judge's opinion (as given in Rootes v. Holliday, 6 Munf. 258,) is just; I did mistake his meaning, when I supposed that he considered an acknowledgment in court, a reexecution: he does not put the case on that ground; and, in truth, he had no reason for doing so, for there was in that case no acknowledgment in court. He says, "The term reacknowledgment seems to have produced in the mind of the chancellor, mistaken ideas." He understands it as meaning no more, than that Richard the father, on the 21st March, acknowledged that he had on the 20th September before, sealed and delivered that deed: a mistake, which information from our clerk would correct. It would be, that when a man comes into court to acknowledge a deed, the question put to him is, not whether he delivered the deed at the date, but whether he then acknowledges the indenture to be his act and deed? So the oath of the witnesses is, that they saw the bargainor seal and deliver the paper as his act and deed. Such was the oath administered to Curry and the other witnesses to this deed. When did they see it sealed and delivered? Not on the 20th September 1785 (for then they were not present, and other witnesses attested that delivery) but on 21st March, when they subscribed it, noting upon the paper, the day of the delivery which they attested." Is it not seen at a glance, how vastly different a case this is, as stated by the court, from a mere acknowledgment of the deed by the bargainor, in court? Observe some further remarks of the judge: he says, "It is admitted by the chancellor, that if this deed had been cancelled, and a new one made, it would have been good. This the counsel also admit; but pursuing the chancellor's idea, they have produced a number of cases, some stating that between the date and the recording, the estate is in the bargainor; others, that it *is in the bargainee; and others still, that it is in suspense. Leaving it to others to reconcile this clashing jargon, we consider what would be the opinion of a plain man on the occasion. It would be, that the estate was in the bargainee, while he held the deed, which was the evidence of it; but when he surrendered that deed to the bargainor, his legal title ceased, and the other was at liberty to convey it to him or any other; and if to him, might either destroy that deed, and make a new one, or by a reexecution of the same paper, give it force as a new deed from that period." Here we see the court considers, that by the bargainee's surrendering the deed to the bargainor, in that case he divested himself of his title, and the other was at liberty to convey to him or another. If our case is like that, and an acknowledgment in court is equal to a reexecution before witnesses, whenever a grantor takes the deed, to make his acknowledgment before the court, he revests himself with the legal title, and may grant to another. Would not this notion, once countenanced by this tribunal, make wild work in the country? The court thought such the effect, where both grantee and grantor (as in Eppe v. Randolph) concurred in the reexecution of the deed; but would that enlightened tribunal have given the same effect to the every day occurrence of the grantor's acknowledging the deed in court? Assuredly not. It must, therefore, have thought with me, that the case before them was very different from the present, and gave no countenance to the attempt now made.

The case of Colquhoun v. Atkinsons, 6 Munf. 550, was also relied on; but, besides that the reexecution there, was also in the country, and the recording subsequent to it, the question was never raised; and not only so, but could not have been raised, for the bill instead of impeaching this deed, claimed in subordination to it.

The case of Moore v. The Auditor, 3 Hen. & Munf. 232, was a case of recording upon the acknowledgment of the grantor; and yet the court decided, that the deed was not recorded within eight months.

561 *Upon the whole, I am most strongly opposed to the decision which will be made in this case, and cannot but consider that it will be very mischievous. I am for affirming the decree.

TUCKER, P. The argument of the main question in this case, having turned very much upon the effect of the second acknowledgment of the deed, it is proper first to ascertain what are the received doctrines of the law as to a second delivery.

The old common law writers tell us, that "a deed cannot have and take effect, at every delivery, as a deed; for if the first delivery take effect, the second delivery is void." Perkins § 154, Cowp. 203. So far as this principle applies to the cases put of an infant or a man in prison, it may be admitted to be both reasonable and unquestionable. But it would be unreasonable to extend it to a case, where at the time of the second delivery, there were rights in the grantor to any intent, which had not been passed out of him by the first delivery. Thus, if A. bargain and sell to B. in fee, A. having only an estate for life, this estate only passes. But if the fee afterwards comes to A. by descent or purchase, a second acknowledgment of the deed would operate upon the inheritable portion of the estate, which had not been passed by the first delivery. And so, in the case of Eppes v. Randolph, it was argued, in relation to the second delivery of a deed in order to have it recorded, that the estate, until recording, remained in the grantor, as to creditors and purchasers, and therefore, the second delivery did operate; and that, if nothing passed against creditors and purchasers by the first delivery, then there was an interest to pass by the reacknowledgment; namely, that portion of the estate which remained in him for the benefit of creditors and purchasers; 2 Call 151. These, and various other able arguments upon this difficult subject, were duly considered in that case, and resulted in the decision, that the second delivery was valid and effectual, to the 562 intent *of making it the point of time from which the eight months were to be computed, within which the deed was to be admitted to record. The deed, there, was dated the 20th September 1785. At that date, it had been sealed and delivered before one set of witnesses. It was reacknowledged before another set of witnesses on the 21st March 1786, and was recorded the 3d July 1786, nearly ten months after the first delivery, but less than four months from the last delivery. If the last delivery was void, then the record of the deed was too late. If the last delivery was valid, then the record of the deed was in good time. The court decided, that the deed was duly recorded, distinctly affirming that the second delivery was effectual. "Upon the whole" said president Pendleton, "we are of opinion, that the deed is to be considered, to every intent and purpose, as a deed of the 21st March 1786, and not before; that it was therefore recorded in due time;" 2 Call 185.

It would be difficult to conceive otherwise of the design of the legislature in the statute of conveyances, than as the court seems in this case to have considered it. The statute contemplated a variety of steps in the completion of a conveyance under its provisions. It required it to be executed before witnesses and proved by them within a given time, or to be acknowledged by the party in court. Until this was done the effect of the conveyance was imperfect. It bound the grantor, indeed, to some intents, but, unless recorded, it left in him almost as much power over the estate as he had before. His conveyance to a subsequent purchaser, without notice, would pass even the legal title to him; Newman v. Chapman, 2 Rand. 93, and a judgment in favor of a precedent or subsequent creditor, with or without notice, would deprive the vendee of the estate; Guerrant v. Anderson, 2 Rand. 208. Did the statute design, that, if by accidental sickness or removal of witnesses, and the death or faithlessness of the vendor, the deed should not be admitted to record in time, the case should be 563 without *remedy? Did it design, that the original vice of the omission to record the deed, should be so inherent that nothing should purge it? If it did not, what is the remedy? There is none more obvious, more simple, and more consistent with the law, than that which the court has sanctioned in Eppes v. Randolph; the redelivery of the deed for passing out of the grantor the dangerous power left in him, of conveying away the legal title to a third person, or of subjecting it to the debts which he might contract or had contracted. A surrender of the conveyance by the grantee to the grantor, would not reveal the title in the grantor so that he might make a new deed; for since the statute of frauds (I speak of the English statute, herein nearly equivalent to our statute of conveyances) has required all conveyances of freehold estates to be by deed, nothing seems to be better settled, than that cancelling or delivering back the deed to the grantor, does not reveal the title; 4 Cruise 497; Doe v. Bingham, 4 Barn. & Ald. 672; 6 Eng. C. L. R. 560; Roe v. Archbishop of York, 6 East 86; Bolton v. Bishop of Carlisle, 2 H. Blacks. 263. So that a conveyance would have nothing to operate upon, except that latent power in the grantor of which I have spoken. And even if the grantee reconveyed to the grantor, of purpose, in that way, to take back a second conveyance, still the original vice would infect the chain of title. It would subject the estate to the claims of creditors anterior to the first deed, and, perhaps, also to subsequent purchasers without notice. Surely, the legislature could not have intended that the omission should be without remedy; and if there be a remedy, that which has been adopted, and which has proceeded upon the principle of the second delivery being valid, is the best that can be devised, and as little liable to technical objection as any other.

It is obvious, indeed, that unless we construe the statute as requiring all the witnesses to be present together, and to witness the same act of delivery, there must of necessity be several deliveries; and yet each of these deliveries is necessary 564 *to make a complete deed, which may be recorded and divest the grantor of all power over the estate. We must, therefore, take it, that the strict technical doctrine, which pronounces a second delivery to be ineffectual, can have no application to this question.

We are relieved, however, from the responsibility of settling this matter by the case of Eppes v. Randolph, which settled it more than thirty-three years ago. No case has come down to us with stronger sanctions than this celebrated case. It has been reported with a degree of care and labour, by one of the able counsel in the cause, and under the eye of his adversaries and the court, which forbids a doubt of its fidelity. It was argued with distinguished ability and zeal, by the most learned and sagacious counsel who ever aided the labours of our predecessors, and before a court over which a judge presided whose learning and wisdom have known no rival in our judicial history. The very question was debated, and the very arguments laboriously presented, and deliberately considered, which have been delivered on this occasion. It was a question interwoven with the titles of the country, and therefore vitally interesting. The decision was to settle the law of conveyancing, and was therefore of the utmost importance. And it has, for thirty-three years, been the received and undisputed law of the land, and counsel have accordingly advised, and titles have been made under the sanction of its authority. Moreover, it has never been impugned by this court. In the case of Moore v. The Auditor, 3 Hen & Munf. 232, it was not even mentioned, and in Rootes v. Holliday, though the decree was affirmed, yet it by no means appears, that it was upon any principle inconsistent with Eppes v. Randolph. Nor, indeed, did the chancellor, in his able opinion, overruling the sophism which attempted to apply the principle of Eppes v. Randolph to the case of Rootes v. Holliday, undertake to question the decision that the deed took effect by its second delivery before witnesses, though he criticised a part of the language which had 565 been used by president *Pendleton.

The case then stands unassailed, and is moreover supported by the decision in Colquhoun v. Atkinsons, 6 Munf. 550, which, on one point, was exactly like it. In that case, the deed of trust to Atkinson, was dated the 9th November 1804. It was not recorded till 16th December 1805, thirteen months after; but it was reacknowledged on the 9th July 1805, about five months before the recording; and its validity was not called in question. There, however, as in Moore v. The Auditor, the question was not discussed; and, in this regard, they may be fairly placed in the balance against each other; except that Colquhoun v. Atkinsons, being last in point of date, is entitled, for that reason, to most consideration.

Taking Eppes and Randolph, then, as law, it establishes these positions: That though a deed has been sealed and delivered before witnesses, yet a subsequent sealing and delivery before new witnesses, is not void, but is effectual to the intent of making that delivery the date from whence the eight months are to be computed; or, in other words, that the second delivery, before new witnesses, is to be taken as a reexecution of that date, so as to make the recording within eight months thereafter, a recording within due time; that this acknowledgment before new witnesses, is so intirely a new execution, that the deed is to be considered, to every intent and purpose, as a deed of that date, and of course it is not to be considered or interpreted as a mere acknowledgment of the first execution and delivery.

Hence, it seems clear, that if the deed from Roane to the trustees, had been reacknowledged before witnesses in April 1805, instead of having been acknowledged in court, such reacknowledgment would have made it a deed as of that date, and the recording would have been in due time. The question, then, is reduced to this point: Can the acknowledgment in court be considered, in this case, equivalent to the reacknowledgment before witnesses?

That the acknowledgment of a deed before witnesses, is sufficient evidence of delivery, would seem, perhaps, infer-

566 rible *from the case of Currie v. Donald, 2 Wash. 58. That such an acknowledgment before a court, followed by a deposit of the deed with the clerk to be recorded, is a sufficient delivery, although the deed was never actually delivered to the bargainee, provided he afterwards assented to it, is not a question now open to be examined. It was expressly decided in the case of The Commonwealth v. Selden, 5 Munf. 160. Indeed, no particular form or ceremony is necessary to make a good delivery. It is sufficient if the grantor testifies his intention to deliver or put the deed into the possession of the other party; Phil. Law Ev. [418.]* And, therefore, a delivery to a third person for the use of the grantee, and without his knowledge, becomes a valid delivery by his subsequent assent, and relates back to the original delivery. Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Mass. Rep. 307; Ruggles v. Ruggles, 13 Johns. Rep. 285. Indeed, there are many cases which shew that a deed, though never parted with, by the person who executed it, may yet operate as a deed, where it has been signed, sealed and acknowledged: as where a grantor signed a deed (which was ready sealed) in the presence of his niece, the grantee not being present, saying "I deliver this as my act and deed;" and as soon as she attested it, took it into his own possession and carried it away; it was resolved to be a good delivery: Doe v. Knight, 5 Barn. & Cress. 671; 12 Eng. C. L. R. 351. In that case, Bayley, J. cites many cases to the same point. In the same case, the principle was also settled, that the delivery to a third person for the use of the grantee, where the grantor parts with all control over the deed, makes the deed effectual from the instant of delivery. For, about a month after the execution above mentioned, the grantor delivered a bundle of papers to his niece, among which was the deed in question, saying "Here, keep this; it belongs to Mr. Garnons," the grantee. This was held good, and the opinion was sustained by many authorities, and among others by Shepherd (Touchstone 57.) who is 567 particularly *strict as to the requisition of delivery. Mr. justice Bayley cites also 2 Roll. Abr. K. 24, pl. 7; Taw v. Bury, Dyer 167; 1 Anders. 4; Alford v. Lea, 2 Leon. 111; Cro. Eliz. 54. Butler and Baker's case, 3 Co. 26, 27, which go indeed to shew, that a deed delivered by the grantor to a third person for the use of the grantee, is a good deed, even before it is delivered over to or accepted by the grantee.

*New York edition of 1820.

This doctrine has a very strong application to the acknowledgment of a deed in court, or before the clerk, in order to its being recorded. That acknowledgment is stated by president Pendleton, 2 Call 184, to be an acknowledgment, that the instrument is the act and deed of the party, and it is followed by a delivery to the officer of the court for the purpose of being recorded. Here, then, is a delivery to a third person. For whose use? for the use of the grantee. With what intent? with intent to perfect the instrument by recording. To whom to be afterwards delivered? to the grantee only, to whom alone the officer of the court would be justified in delivering it. It brings the case, then, completely within the principle, that where the grantor has parted with all control over the deed, the delivery is complete, though it be made to a third person.

That the acknowledgment of a deed before the court, will have the effect of a delivery, where there has been no previous delivery, would not, I think, be denied. Since the statute allowing the acknowledgment of deeds before the clerk, the sealing and delivery in presence of witnesses, has become more rare than formerly. It is more convenient for the parties to go to the clerk's office, than to take the witnesses there; and a very large proportion of the conveyances of the country are now executed without the intervention of witnesses. Titles would be shaken throughout the commonwealth, if such transactions were now to be assailed; and the case of The Commonwealth v. Selden has, therefore, wisely confirmed them.

Confining ourselves to the proofs in this cause, we need, perhaps, go no farther; for there is no evidence here of any 568 *delivery before witnesses, or of any other delivery than that which is evinced by the acknowledgment in court.

But I do not think it necessary to rest the case on this defect in the proofs. Admitting (what I doubt not was the fact) that there had been a delivery before witnesses at the date of the deed, the 6th April 1804, I think the acknowledgment in 1805, amounted to a new delivery, and not merely to the acknowledgment of a previous delivery.

As the act of acknowledgment may have this operation, where such is the design of the parties, it remains to inquire, what construction shall be given to the act, when it is done after the expiration of the time limited for recording. Two constructions offer themselves: one which will give some effect to the act; the other which will leave it without effect: one which will effectuate the intent of the parties; the other, which will defeat it: one which will authorize the recording of the deed; the other, which will render that recording nugatory: one which will give effect to the conveyance; the other which will avoid it. There can be no hesitation in choosing that which will sustain the transaction, and give effect to the fair and honest intentions of the parties. When a deed has run out of date, and is then reacknowledged and delivered before witnesses, or before the court, for the express purpose of curing the defect, I infer, that it is to every intent a new execution, and not a mere acknowledgment of a former execution which is out of date. And in this inference, I think myself supported by the principles of the law, as applied to the acts of the parties.

On the second point in the case, I am of opinion, that according to Scott v. Gibbon, 5 Munf. 86, the joint interest of Roane and his wife cannot be touched by the creditors of Roane. But I do not perceive that the reversionary interest for the life of James Roane himself is protected by the conveyance. For though it is a contingent interest, and therefore not such a trust as may under our statute be taken in execution, yet, in equity, it is certainly responsible to the creditor. Upon reversing the 569 decree, therefore, I would not *be understood to direct that the injunction should be perpetuated in toto, without reserving to the creditor the right to institute any proper proceeding for the purpose of securing to himself the benefit of this interest of James Roane, whatever may be its value.

CABELL and BROOKE, J., concurred in the opinion of the president.

Decree reversed, and cause remanded to the court of chancery, with directions to reinstate the injunction, without prejudice to the right of the appellee to institute any proceedings, for the purpose of subjecting to the payment of his debt, James Roane's contingent interest for life, in remainder, after the death of his wife.

Miller v. Trueheart and Others.

November, 1833.

Nuisance—Rebuilding Mill Dam—Stagnant Water—Injunction—Case at Bar.—A mill and mill dam is erected in 1815, by leave of court, according to the statute concerning mills &c.: the stagnation of the water in the mill pond proves injurious to the health of the neighbourhood; and one of the neighbours, thereby injured, brings an action against the mill owners, and recovers damages at law: about the time of this recovery, the mill dam is carried away, and the pond drained; and the mill owners, after the recovery, are proceeding to rebuild the mill dam, proposing certain expedients to prevent the stagnation of the waters from being again injurious to the health of the neighbourhood: HELD, a court of chancery, upon a bill by the person who recovered the judgment at law against the mill owners, may and ought to interfere, and enjoin them from rebuilding the dam, unless it shall appear that the expedients proposed by the mill owners, will be effectual to prevent the mischief in future, which ought to be ascertained by a jury upon an issue directed for the purpose.

Miller exhibited a bill against Trueheart and others in the superior court of chancery of Richmond, setting forth, that Trueheart and others, in the year 1815, 570 erected a mill *and mill dam on a branch of Deep creek in the county of Powhatan, only 1925 yards, and in a south western direction, from Miller's dwelling house; that the mill pond covered ten or twelve acres of land; that Miller's dwelling place, always before the erection of the mill dam, and the stagnation of the waters thereby, had been as healthy as any in that part of the country, but immediately afterwards, it became and continued to be for many years, extremely sickly, and his whole family were afflicted with severe bilious diseases every year; that Miller imputed this remarkable change, and it was imputed by intelligent physicians and others well acquainted with the localities, and was no doubt justly imputable, to the effluvia from the stagnant waters of the mill pond; that in 1823, Miller brought suit against Trueheart and others for the nuisance, in the circuit court of Powhatan, and in 1824, having, on a full and fair trial, proved the injury sustained by him to the satisfaction of a jury of the country, recovered a verdict and judgment for 400 dollars; that about the same time, the mill dam was carried away by a fresh, and the pond drained, and thenceforth, Miller's dwelling place was restored to its original salubrity; but that Trueheart and others were now about to repair and rebuild the mill dam, and if they should be permitted to do so, Miller had the strongest reason to fear, and did apprehend, that the severe visitations of disease, with which he and his family had been afflicted during the former continuance of the mill and mill pond, would be repeated, and his dwelling place rendered unsafe for habitation; and that this was an evil for which he could not be compensated by any damages which a jury could assess: therefore, he prayed an injunction to inhibit Trueheart and others from proceeding to repair and rebuild their mill dam &c.

The principal case is cited in Powell v. Bentley, etc., Co., 34 W. Va. 808, 12 S. E. Rep. 1086.

The injunction was awarded.

Trueheart and others, in their answers, suggested, without positively asserting, that their mill and mill dam had been erected, in the first instance, by 571 leave of court; for they said (what would have been wholly impertinent if they had not obtained such leave) that the mill dam having been carried away, as stated in the bill, they were proceeding to repair and rebuild the same, as they had lawful right to do, according to the provisions of the statute. And they insisted, and affirmed, that it was the general opinion of persons most competent to judge on the subject, that the injurious effects upon the health of the neighbourhood, and especially on the salubrity of Miller's dwelling place, were owing solely to the number of trees standing in the pond, deadened by being overflowed with the water, and gradually decaying; and that, in order to obviate the mischievous effects complained of by Miller, they proposed, and had begun, to cut down and remove the dead trees, and to clear away and burn all the rubbish and vegetable matter, from the bed of the mill pond, and so to remove the only cause, as they said, of any injurious effects to the health of the neighbourhood.

Miller exhibited with his bill, the record of his suit against Trueheart and others, in the circuit court of Powhatan, and many depositions of witnesses, taken and read in that cause. And it was proved, by the evidence of many witnesses, that, before the erection of the mill dam, Miller's dwelling place had been uncommonly healthy, and never subject to bilious fevers. An aged woman who had lived near by for fifty years, and reared many children, deposed, that her own dwelling place, and Miller's, had been, for all that time, and until the erection of the mill dam, uncommonly healthy, and since the dam was erected, uncommonly sickly. Five physicians were examined, who were uniform and clear in the opinion, that the sickness in Miller's family during the continuance of the mill dam and mill pond, was caused by effluvia from the pond: two of these who had practised in Miller's family, described the sickness as unprecedented; that there were not enough of the well to wait on the sick; that, of the family consisting of 572 forty-five *persons, thirty-two were down at a time; and that between 1815 and 1823, four of Miller's family, and a son among them, died, as these physicians believed, from the pernicious effects of the mill pond. And it was proved also, that since the dam had been carried away, and the pond drained, the former salubrity of Miller's dwelling place had been restored.

The chancellor, on the motion of Trueheart and others, dissolved the injunction, but reserved liberty to the parties to apply again to the court, the plaintiff to reinstate the injunction, or the defendant to have the bill dismissed with costs: saying, that it would be his duty to require proof, if insisted on, of the matter in the answer not responsive to the bill, namely, that all the dead timber and rubbish in the bed of the mill pond, had been or would be removed or burned, before the ground should be again overflowed by the mill pond; and that he himself was inclined to think that the defendants were correct as to the effect of such precautions; but that they must proceed at their own peril, both as to cause and effect.

From this order, upon the petition of Miller to this court, an appeal was allowed him.

The attorney general, Taylor and Leigh, for the appellant.

Johnson, for the appellees.

CARR, J. If the dam in this case, be considered as a private nuisance, it is well settled, that a court of equity will, under circumstances interfere by injunction to arrest it, upon the general concurrent jurisdiction which it exercises in such cases. And if it be said, that this dam cannot be taken as a nuisance, because it was built by leave of court founded on an express statute (a point which I do not think it necessary to decide) yet, I think, the interference of the court may be justified, on the ground of preventing irreparable mischief.

Many cases might be cited to shew, 573 that the *courts of equity are in the constant practice of granting injunctions to prevent the destruction of specific chattels, not properly the subject of compensation; and the principle will surely apply, a multo fortiori, to cases in which the interference of the court is necessary to prevent the destruction of health and life. It is true, this is one of those extraordinary powers of the court, which should be exercised with great caution, and only in clear and strong cases. But this is such a case.

*The statute, namely, concerning mills and mill dams. 2 Rev. Code. ch. 235. § 1-7, pp. 225-8.—Note in Original Edition.

[Here the judge stated the evidence in the causes, and shewed that the allegations of the bill were incontestably proved.] If this be not a case, not merely justifying, but calling for the preventive justice of the court, I cannot conceive one that would.

But it was said, that whatever might be the power of the court on general principles, our statute regulating the building of mills, has taken it away in this case: that that has prescribed the course to be pursued by one wishing to establish a mill; he must have a jury of inquest; they must report, that the health of the neighbours will not be injured; all parties concerned may contest this report; the court must weigh all the circumstances; and in its sound discretion, give or withhold the leave asked. And it was strenuously insisted, that when, with all these precautions, and under the sanction of the law, a party went on to erect his mill, and invest perhaps his whole property in it, no court of equity could revoke his license, and thus destroy his property: and this was considered as more strongly proved by that clause of the statute, which authorizes the owner of a mill destroyed by any accident to rebuild it, without any order of court, provided he begins in one year and finishes in three. It must be admitted, that when a man has thus acquired a property valuable to himself, and acknowledged by the law as of public benefit, it is a high and strong handed measure to interfere with it; but that it can under no possible circumstances be touched, is a proposition to which I can by no means assent. And it seems to me, that the general principles governing the interference

574 of courts *on the subject, so far from being abrogated, or even weakened, are strengthened and enlarged, by the cautious and benign policy of the statute. A glance at its provisions will shew how exceedingly careful it has been of the health of the citizen. The jury is directed to inquire and report, whether in its opinion, the health of the neighbours will be annoyed by the stagnation of the waters. If the jury reports that no such annoyance will take place, any person may contest the truth of the statement, and produce evidence before the court; and if upon this evidence, the court shall think that the jury is wrong, it will refuse leave to erect the mill; if on the contrary, the jury reports that the health of any part of the neighbours will in its opinion be affected, or will probably be affected (Mayo v. Turner, 1 Munf. 405,) this is conclusive: no evidence can be adduced to controvert it; for the law says, that in such case, the court shall not give leave to build the mill, and erect the dam. Again, notwithstanding all these precautions, it occurred to the law makers, that the jury might be mistaken, or some thing omitted; and they added, that no inquest taken by virtue of the statute, and no opinion or judgment of the court thereupon, shall bar any public prosecution, or private action, which could have been had or maintained if this statute had never been made, other than prosecutions, and actions for such injuries as were actually foreseen and estimated upon the inquest; that is, in effect, that as to all injuries not actually foreseen and estimated, the subject shall remain as if the statute had never been made. Now, it must be admitted by all, that the annoyance to the health of the plaintiff's family, which has followed the building of the mill, and which all the witnesses, and a jury sworn between the parties, say, was caused, by the stagnation of the waters in the mill pond was not foreseen or estimated upon the inquest: estimated it could not be, for though the law allows other injuries to be estimated, and the party to be compensated for them, it attempts no such vain and cruel thing

575 with respect to health. If the *jury finds, that fish of passage, or ordinary navigation &c. may be obstructed, it may inquire how these obstructions can be removed, and the court, in granting leave, will take care to lay the party applying under proper conditions for preventing such inconveniences. But not so with regard to the health of the neighbours: if, in the opinion of the jury, that will be annoyed by the stagnation of the waters, it is not at liberty to inquire into the means of removing or preventing this inconvenience; nor is the court authorized to grant leave, in such cases, laying the party under conditions to do this or that, which it may think would be effectual to prevent the annoyance. The law tolerates no such experiments, made at the risk of human life.

It was said the savings of the statute did not comprehend this equitable interference, as they extend only to public prosecutions and private actions. I consider the true meaning of the statute to be this: that as to injuries not foreseen by the jury, the party shall have every remedy, which he would have had, if the statute had never been made. It has been seen, that the statute placed health above every other thing: it is admitted, that for injury to health, the permission to build the mill does not bar an action; and this case presents the fact, that for such injury a jury has given damages. If the dam were again erected, for the sickness and deaths of every summer, an action would accrue to the plaintiff: but would these damages redress his injuries? We see, that from 1815 to 1823, he lost four of his family, a son among them, from the effects of the pond, as the physicians think and depose. How many he might lose annually, if the dam were rebuilt, we cannot say; but this we may assume, that for the loss of a child or wife, no damages could compensate him, could place him where he stood.

The case, then, in every point of view, was one, I think, strongly calling for the preventive justice of the court. The injunction was properly allowed. It is equally clear to me, that the chancellor erred in dissolving it, simply upon the answer of the defendants, saying that they meant to cut down the trees, and clear up the rub-576 bish in the pond. It is one *of those very experiments, involving life, which the law will not permit. And as to saying that the defendants would make this experiment at their own peril, it is not true: they would make it at the peril of the plaintiff, because they could not restore to him any member of his family, who might fall a sacrifice to it.

I think then, that the decree should be reversed, the cause sent back, and the injunction reinstated.

TUCKER, P. However difficult it may be to ascertain the causes of those diseases which are usually attributed to malaria, and however conflicting the opinions of the learned have been upon the subject, it must be admitted, that the evidence in this case has established, as far as evidence can establish it, that the health of the plaintiff's family was grievously annoyed and impaired by the mill dam of the appellees. This fact is put beyond question by the verdict between the parties, which, as between them is intirely conclusive; so much so, indeed, that if the dam were still in exactly the same situation as before, the verdict would be conclusive, in a second action for further damages, of the fact of nuisance. Unless, therefore, the evidence should establish, satisfactorily, that the removal of decayed timber, and other precautions, will prevent the recurrence of like evils, in case the dam be rebuilt, there can be no question, that the appellant will be entitled to new actions against the appellees for the purpose of abating this formidable nuisance. For the statute, in authorizing the establishment of mills, scrupulously guards against the erection of them, when the health of the neighbourhood might be annoyed thereby. It requires the jury to respond to that inquiry, and it prohibits the leave to build a mill where the health of the surrounding population will be endangered. Nay more; lest the jury might not anticipate such a consequence, it expressly provides, that no inquest under a writ of ad quod damnum, and no opinion or judgment of the court thereupon, shall bar any public prosecution or private action, which could have been had or maintained, other 577 than prosecutions *and actions for such injuries as were actually foreseen and estimated upon such inquest. If, then, the rebuilding of the dam should renew the nuisance, the right of public prosecution and of private action will be in full force.

The private action which is thus reserved to the party, may be either an action on the case, or a writ quod permittat prosternere; the last of which does not merely give damages, as a satisfaction for a past injury, but also strikes at the root of the evil, by removing the cause of the mischief itself. 3 Blacks. Comm. 220. It is, indeed, no longer in use; because the action on the case has been made to subserve all its purposes, by the course of practice established by the courts. For, though the verdict of the jury in the first action, gives to the plaintiff only a just satisfaction for the injury he has sustained; yet every continuance of a nuisance is held to be a fresh one, "and very exemplary damages will be given," says Blackstone, "if after one verdict against him, the defendant shall have the hardihood to continue it."

Thus, it is clear, the party injured has a right to have the nuisance abated; and that that object may be pursued by repeated actions on the case, until it is accomplished; or the party may resort at once to the disused, yet still legal remedy of the writ quod permittat prosternere.

I am also inclined to think, from the evidence in the case, that the mill dam, as it existed, was a public nuisance, and might have been abated by a public prosecution, although a private action might also be sustained by the individual who had suffered special injury from the erection of it. 5 Bac. Abr. Nuisances, B. p. 151; Regina v. Wigg, 2 Ld. Raym. 1163; Dimmett v. Eskridge, 6 Munf. 308.

Admitting, then, that the rebuilding of the dam will renew the nuisance, it is perfectly obvious, that the appellant, by one or other legal remedy, will have a right to have it abated. And this being so, can there be a doubt, that a court of equity possesses the power, by injunction, to prevent a party from building up a dam, which 578 his adversary would instantly *have a right to make him pull down, though irreparable injury to the health or the life of the plaintiff or the members of his family, might be done, before that object could be effected? I think not. The jurisdiction, though confessedly one of much delicacy, is nevertheless unquestionable, where the right is clear, the danger imminent, and the injury irreparable. Mayor of London v. Bolt, 5 Ves. 129; Crockford v. Alexander, 15 Id. 138; Twort v. Twort, 16 Id. 128; Attorney General v. Nichol, Id. 341; Crowder v. Tinkler, 19 Id. 617; Crenshaw v. Slate River Co., 6 Rand. 245; Gardner v. Newburgh, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 164; 1 Madd. Ch. Prac. 155.

From this view of this subject, I think it obvious, that the whole case turns upon the question whether the rebuilding of the dam will renew the nuisance. I am inclined to think it will, but as the appellees have expended possibly large sums in the erection of their mill, it was proper that the chancellor should have had that fact ascertained, as far at least as it is practicable to do so. On the one hand, the injunction ought not to have been perpetuated, without the institution of a previous inquiry, whether by the means already adopted by the appellees, or by some other means, the danger of injury to the health of the neighbourhood could not be obviated. On the other, the injunction ought not to have been dissolved, and the appellees permitted to proceed at their own risk, before it was ascertained that there would be no probable risk to the appellant.

Therefore, I think the decree of the chancellor is erroneous, and that it should be reversed, and the cause sent back, with instructions to direct an issue to ascertain, whether the health of the appellant or his family will be annoyed by the stagnation of the water, in the event of the dam being rebuilt.

CABELL and BROOKE, J., concurring with the president, decree reversed, and cause remanded with the directions suggested by him.

579 *Cartigne v. Raymond and Another.
November, 1833.

Chancery Practice—Joint Defendants—Defence by One—Effect.—Case at Bar.—Upon a bill in chancery by a distributee against an administrator and his surety, alleging that the administrator has not duly accounted, and praying an account, the bill is taken pro confesso as to the administrator, but the surety answers, and proves, that the plaintiff, on a full and final settlement, has released the administrator, and so is not entitled to an account; upon which the chancellor dismisses the bill with costs as to both defendants: Held, the bill was properly dismissed as to both defendants.

This was a bill exhibited in the superiour court of chancery, by Catharine Cartigne against John Raymond, the administrator of Eliz. Allergue (who was the mother of the plaintiff and of this defendant) and Lodowick Brown, the surety of Raymond in his administration bond; charging, that Raymond had settled his account of administration before a commissioner appointed by the hustings court of Petersburg, and by that account appeared to be indebted to his intestate's estate in a balance of 872 dollars, of which the plaintiff as his codistributee was entitled to a moiety, and that he had never paid the same to her; surcharging and falsifying that account in several important particulars specified in the bill; and praying an account, and a decree for the plaintiff's share of the just balance which should be found due thereon, against Raymond and Brown his surety. Raymond did not appear and answer, and as to him the bill was regularly taken pro confesso. But Brown put in his answer, in which he alleged, that a full and final settlement had been made between Raymond and the plaintiff his sister; that he transferred to her, and she received property to the full amount of her share of their mother's estate, and she thereupon released him, formally by deed, from all demands on this account; and that this settlement was made, in order that Raymond might fulfil the purpose he then had, of leaving the country, without exposing his surety to loss, and he had since gone away; and he insisted, therefore that the plaintiff was not entitled to the account prayed in her bill. The truth of the answer was proved. And the cause coming on 580 *for hearing as to Raymond by default, and as to Brown on the bill, answer, replication thereto, exhibits and depositions, the chancellor dismissed the bill both as to Raymond and Brown, and gave them both a decree for costs. From this decree, the plaintiff appealed to this court.

The cause was argued by Allison for the appellant, and Spooner for the appellee. There was some discussion upon the merits, whether the proofs established the defence

Chancery Practice—Joint Defendants—Defence by One—Effect.—Where a bill is filed against two or more defendants jointly interested, and is taken for confessed against one or more of them for want of appearance, and one or more of the other defendants appear, make defence, and disprove the complainant's case, the bill should be dismissed as to all the defendants. This is well settled. Aiken v. Connelley, 2 Va. Dec. 384, citing the principal case. To the same effect, the principal case is also cited in Payne v. Graves, 5 Leigh 562. 579, and foot-note: Ashby v. Bell, 80 Va. 819; Terry v. Fontaine, 83 Va. 468. 2 S. E. Rep. 748; Harrison v. Wallton, 96 Va. 728, 30 S. E. Rep. 372; Echols v. Brennan, 99 Va. 155, 37 S. E. Rep. 786.

set up in Brown's answer; but of that the court saw no reason to doubt. The only point of law was a question of practice; namely, whether, as the allegations of the bill stood confessed as to Raymond, he standing out in default, it was proper to dismiss the bill as to him as well as Brown?

TUCKER, P. Though the bill was taken for confessed as to Raymond for want of an appearance and answer, yet his codefendant and surety answered, denied (as far as he could deny) the allegations of the bill, and has disproved them. He is then entitled to a dismissal, clearly. Now, his defence did not rest on matter separate, distinct, and applying only to himself. Admitting Raymond to be indebted, the surety had no defence. He defended himself by disproving the charge against his principal, for whom he was bound. They are conjunct in interest. If Raymond had wasted or purloined the estate, the other defendant was bound as his surety, and could not be discharged. The case is therefore clearly within the principle of Clason v. Morris, 10 Johns. Rep. 524. Were it otherwise, it would lead to this absurdity, that after dismissing the bill as to the surety, and decreeing against Raymond, the plaintiff might immediately bring her suit on the bond against the surety, and recover at law, though he had been discharged here.

Decree affirmed.

*Toole v. Stephen.

(Absent TUCKER, P.)

Usury—Case at Bar.—S. and N. being indebted to the F. and M. bank, and the bank having recovered judgments against them for the debts, and the debtors then applying to the bank for indulgence, the bank agrees to give them a long indulgence, upon their agreeing to give real security for the debt, and moreover to pay the attorney of the bank all the costs of the suits, and the commission which the bank had agreed to pay him for collecting and securing the debt; the debtors give the real security for the debt; and one of them pays the costs and part of the commission to the attorney, and his executor gives the attorney his note for the balance of the commission; the attorney having full notice of the terms of the agreement between the bank and the debtors: Held, the agreement between the bank and the debtors, and therefore the note for the commission to the attorney, were usurious.

Decree between Codefendants.—Decree between codefendants refused under the particular circumstances of the case.

Adam Stephen deceased, having contracted a debt of 3750 dollars to the Farmers and Mechanics bank of Georgetown, as indorser for the accommodation of others who had failed, and George Newkirk having, in like manner as indorser for others, contracted a debt of 3510 dollars to the same bank, Stephen and Newkirk being joint indorsers on some of the notes, the bank placed the notes for the debts in the hands of John Baker, their attorney at law, to collect the debts from the indorsers, respectively, by suit; and Baker accordingly brought suits against them, and recovered judgments. Stephen and Newkirk, thereupon, applied to the bank for indulgence; and, upon their agreeing that each should become responsible for the whole amount of the debts due by both, and should each give a mortgage of certain real estate held by them, respectively, to secure the payment of the whole amount due by both, and should, moreover, bind themselves jointly to pay, or secure to be paid, to Baker, the costs of the suits, and the usual commission of five per cent. on the whole sum, which the bank was bound, by its agreement with Baker, its attorney, to pay him, for collecting or securing the debts, the bank 582 agreed, on its part, to *give them a long credit for the debt. Stephen and Newkirk executed the mortgages, in pursuance of the agreement on their part; and Stephen, in his lifetime, paid Baker all the costs of the suits, and near half of his commission, leaving a balance of 190 dollars of the commission due; and, after his death, Baker applied to Alex. Stephen, his representative, for this balance, who gave him his own note for it; Baker having, at the time, exact knowledge of the particulars of the arrangement made by Stephen and Newkirk with the bank, and being indeed the agent of the bank in taking the mortgages for the whole debt. Baker assigned this note to Toole, and then died; and Toole brought a suit on the note against Alex. Stephen, and recovered a judgment.

Whereupon, Alex. Stephen exhibited his bill against Toole and Tapscott the executor of Baker, without making the bank a party, setting forth the facts above stated; and insisting, in the first place, that the balance claimed by Baker of his testator, and for which he gave his note, was, in truth, due from Newkirk, and ought to have been demanded of him; and, in the next place, and principally, that the consideration of the note was usurious; and praying, therefore, an injunction to inhibit Toole, the assignee, from enforcing his judgment at law. The injunction was awarded. The answers of the defendants, disclaimed all personal knowledge on the subject: But the evidence in the cause, established the facts of the case as above stated.

The chancellor, upon the hearing, perpetuated the injunction, with costs; and Toole appealed from the decree to this court.

Leigh for the appellant said, 1. that the commission was undoubtedly due to Baker, from the bank; and if the debtors of the bank thought proper to make an arrangement with it, by which they assumed the payment of the debt it owed to him, and thereby to induce him to give up his just claim on the bank, he, at least, practised no usury, and they ought not to be allowed to avoid their obligation to him, on

583 *the ground that the bank had practised usury on them. He, in effect, gave a full and fair consideration for the note. The plaintiff might have a right to recover the money from the bank, who had practised the extortion, but not to avoid his obligation to Baker, who had practised no extortion, and to whom it was perfectly immaterial, who paid him the commission acknowledgedly due to him. And as to the bank, all it stipulated for, was the reimbursement to it by its debtors, of the exact expenses it had incurred in consequence of their neglect to make punctual payment of their just debts. But 2. if it was proper to injoin Toole the assignee, from enforcing his judgment at law, the court should have given him a decree against his codefendant Tapscott, the executor of the assignor, this being a case between codefendants, made out upon pleadings and proofs as between the plaintiff and defendants. Chamley v. Ld. Dunsany, 1 Scho. & Lef. 689, 709, 718. Indeed, the court ought not to have proceeded to a final decree, until the bank was made a party, so that a decree might have been given against it for the money due to Baker.

Stanard, for the appellee, said it was quite indifferent to him, what recourse Toole might be entitled to against Baker's executor, or he against the bank; but he suggested, that, as their respective remedies at law were very easy and simple, there was no manner of necessity to perplex this case with an effort to administer justice between the defendants, especially between the defendants and the bank, which was out of the commonwealth. On this point he also cited Hubbard v. Goodwin, 3 Leigh 492, 522. As the commission due from the bank to Baker, which the bank stipulated that Stephen and Newkirk should pay him, as part of the consideration of its forbearance of the debt they owed, was so much over and above the principal and interest of the debt, the consideration of Stephen's note to Baker for a balance of the commission, was plainly usurious; and as Baker had knowledge of all the particulars of the arrangement between the bank and

PER CURIAM. The decree is right, and is to be affirmed, in omnibus.

Dupuy v. Hardaway.

November, 1883.

Guardians—Appointment—Displacement—Appeal.*—Under the statutes, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 64, § 2, ch. 66, § 50, 51, no appeal lies from an order of the county court appointing or displacing a guardian, to the superior court of chancery, or from the court of chancery to the court of appeals.

Testamentary Guardian—Appointment—What Amounts to.*—Quære.—A testator having devised and bequeathed real and personal property to his daughter, direct, that she shall have a good education, and live in a respectable family, and authorizes his executor to use part of the principal of the estate given her, if the income be not sufficient to carry that his purpose into effect: the daughter being at the time under fourteen years of age: Quære, whether this amounts to the appointment of the executor testamentary guardian of the infant daughter?

James Hardaway late of Nottoway died in September 1826, having by his last will and testament, devised and bequeathed real and personal estate to his infant daughter and only child, Mariel Hardaway, and then made the following provision in respect to her and the property he had given her—"As it is my wish that my daughter Mariel shall have a good education and live in a decent respectable family, my executors are hereby authorized to make use of a part of the principal of the estate given to her, if the income is not sufficient to carry into effect my wish respecting her." The will was proved in the county court of Nottoway, in October 1826, and William Dupuy, one of the executors named therein, qualified as such; and at the same time, he qualified, as testamentary guardian of the infant daughter of the testator, by giving bond with surety for the faithful discharge of this trust.

585 *The infant appeared in person before the county court, at January term 1829, and made choice of Archer Robertson for her guardian. It was proved to the court, that she was above fourteen and under sixteen. There was no proof or even allegation, that Dupuy had been guilty of any neglect or misconduct in his trust as guardian, or was any way unworthy of it. Dupuy appeared, and opposed the appointment of another guardian; insisting, that he was the testamentary guardian, and that it was not competent to the court to displace him without any cause proved or alleged. But the court held, that Dupuy was not a testamentary guardian, and that the infant had a right to choose a guardian; and, therefore, appointed Robertson her guardian, in compliance with her choice. From this order Dupuy appealed to the superior court of chancery of Richmond, which affirmed it; and then he appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Leigh for the appellant, and Spooner for the appellee.

I. The question on the merits, was, whether the testator's will constituted Dupuy testamentary guardian of his infant daughter?

Leigh said, that the statute concerning guardians &c. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 108, § 1, p. 405, taken from the English statute of the 12 Car. 2, ch. 24, authorized a father to appoint a testamentary guardian for his infant child, during any part of the infancy of such child; but it prescribed no precise form in which such an appointment should be made. It was always a question of intention. Here, the testator gave to his executors, the management of the estate he had given to his daughter, with power even to use the principal for her benefit, and the care of her education, maintenance and residence; he gave them, in effect, the custody and care of her person and of her estate; in other words, all the powers belonging to the office of guardian. He cited the following cases, decided on the English statute in pari materia; Bedell v. Constable, 586 Vaugh. 177; Reynolds v. Lady Tenham, 9 Mod. 40; 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. 486, ca. 16, and S. C. reported by the name of Lady Teynham v. Lennard, 4 Bro. P. C. Toml. ed. 302. Besides, in this case, the county court had decided that Dupuy was a testamentary guardian, by exacting bond and security from him as such, according to the 2nd section of the statute concerning guardians &c. If Dupuy was testamentary guardian, he was entitled to the wardship by his testator's will, and could not be removed without cause; Foster v. Denny, 2 Ch. Ca. 237; 1 Eq. Ca. Abr. 260, ca. 3.

Spooner answered, 1. that the will of this testator made no appointment of a guardian for his daughter; for it did not devise the custody of her, within the statute; which, he said, was essential to constitute a testamentary guardian. 2. That if there was here, any good appointment of a testamentary guardian, yet the infant being under fourteen years of age at the time, and no time being appointed by the will for the continuance of the guardianship, the testamentary guardianship continued only till the infant was fourteen, when by law she had a right to choose a guardian. And for both these propositions, he relied on the resolutions in the case of Bedell v. Constable, Vaugh. 184, 5.

II. But the cause went off on another point; namely, whether an appeal lay from the order of the county court appointing Robertson the guardian, and thereby taking away the wardship from Dupuy? or from the order of the court of chancery, to this court?

Leigh said, that if any appeal lay from such an order of a county court, it lay clearly to the superior court of chancery, not of law; the jurisdiction in respect of guardians, belonging to the chancery side of the county court by the express provision of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 108, § 4, p. 406. The appeal lay to the superior court of chancery, and thence to this court; for the statute gave such appeals, wherever the subject in controversy was lands, slaves, or other specific property, no matter what might be the value. Id. ch. 64, § 2, p. 190, ch. 66, § 50, 51, p. 206. Now, 587 *he said, the right of a testamentary guardian, was that of a guardian in common socage; and such wardship was a specific right of property, for which the statute gave the guardian an action of ravishment of ward, or trespass, to recover his ward, if wrongfully taken and detained from him, and damages; Id. ch. 108, § 1, pp. 405, 6. Wardship of every kind was always regarded as not a bare authority, but an interest, a right of property; though a guardian in socage had nothing to his own use, but only to the use of the ward. 3 Bac. Abr. Guardian, E. F. p. 413. If a father appoint the mother of his children their guardian, such wardship, though worth little or nothing in a pecuniary point of view, was yet of inestimable value to the mother; and it were strange, if the law had given the county court power to take it away from her, without cause or pretence of cause, and without appeal.

Spooner maintained, that wardship was not specific property, within the meaning of the statutes concerning the appellate jurisdiction of the superior courts of chancery or of this court. It had been decided, that no appeal lies from an order of the county court, rescinding indentures of apprenticeship, and taking the apprentices from their master; which was a stronger case than the present. Cooper v. Saunders, 1 Hen. & Munf. 412. He also cited Ritchie v. Mauro, 2 Peters 243.

CARR, J. The question is, whether an appeal lay from the order complained of? If not, it is unnecessary to look further.

As appeals are unknown to the common law, some statute must be shewn giving the appeal in this case, or we must decide that it does not lie. Accordingly, the counsel for the appellant relied on those sections of the chancery law, which give an appeal from the county court to the superiour court, where the debt &c. shall be of the value of 33 dollars, and from the court of chancery to this court, where the debt &c. are of the value of 100 dollars; or, in either case, "where lands, slaves, or other specific property shall be the subject of the decree;" and he contended, that the wardship which was the subject of this decree, was comprehended by the terms specific property. I cannot think that such is the meaning of the statute. The claim of wardship is certainly not, in the usual acceptation of the words, a claim of specific property. In the case cited from Peters, chief justice Marshall says, "The office of guardian is of no value, except so far as it affords a compensation for labour and services, thereafter to be earned." It will be observed, that this phrase specific property is only used, in relation to appeals to or from the court of chancery. The statute says that this court shall have jurisdiction in appeals from the courts of law, if the matter in controversy be equal in value, exclusive of costs, to 100 dollars &c. or be a freehold or franchise, or where such freehold or franchise, or the title or bounds of lands are drawn in question; or in chancery cases, where lands, slaves or other specific property, shall be the subject of the decree or order. It is one of the distinctive powers of a court of equity, to decree the thing in specie, in many cases where the courts of law give damages only. Thus, if a party claims a family painting, or any other article, to which he may attach a peculiar value, the pretium affectionis, for which no damages will compensate him, equity will give him the thing itself. It seems to me, that it is in reference to this feature of equitable jurisdiction, that the law uses the phrase specific property. The collocation too, of the sentence,—lands, slaves or other specific property,—would seem to exclude the idea, that it was meant to comprehend, a claim of guardianship. This court has decided, that from the decision of the county court, in a question of apprenticeship, there is no appeal; and if that is not embraced by the terms "specific property," much less (I think) is a claim of wardship. If the counsel who took this position, had sat down to draw a clause giving appeals, and had meant to include this matter of guardianship, he would have couched his meaning in no such vague and 589 *dubious phrase as is here used. This conclusion, which I should draw from his known precision and accuracy, is strengthened, when we turn to the 30th section of the circuit superiour court law of 1831, Supp. to Rev. Code, ch. 109, p. 145, where, speaking of appeals, we find these words: "Appeals shall be demandable as of right,—from sentences or orders of the said inferior courts, in controversies concerning the probat of wills and letters of administration, and concerning the appointing, displacing and controlling, the guardians of infants, and committees of persons of insane mind." This court, then, has no jurisdiction of the case; and the appeal must be dismissed.

The other judges concurring, appeal dismissed.

Sheriff's Return—Amendment*—Case at Bar.—Upon a bond assigned for valuable consideration, the assignees bring suit against the obligor, recover judgment, and sue out a fi. fa. which is levied, and a forthcoming bond taken, and that being returned forfeited, execution is awarded thereon against principal and surety, and a fi. fa. is sued out on the forthcoming bond; and on this execution, the sheriff returns nulla bona as to the surety but not as to the principal; then the assignees bring suit against the assignors, and after trial and verdict for defendants, court allows the sheriff to amend his return, and to return nulla bona as to the principal in the forthcoming bond; and gives plaintiff leave to amend his declaration, and to count on the amended return: HARP. it was right to permit the sheriff so to amend his return, and to permit the plaintiffs so to amend their declaration.

Same—Conclusiveness†—Case at Bar.—In the action between the assignees and assignors the sheriff's return of nulla bona on the execution against the obligors in the forthcoming bond, though amended after the assignees' action and five years after the return, so as to shew the insolvency of both, is conclusive evidence of such insolvency.

Same—Same—Same.—In such case, the insolvency of the debtors might be proved by other evidence, but the assignees have a right to the conclusive evidence of the sheriff's return.

Forthcoming Bond—Insolvency of Obligor—Witness—Deputy Sheriff.—It seems, the deputy sheriff in whose hands the execution on the forthcoming bond was placed, is a competent witness to prove the insolvency of the obligors.

Sheriff's Return—Amendment—Time of.—A court from which process is issued may permit the sheriff's return thereon to be amended at any time, even though a suit or motion founded on the original return be then pending, and even though the proposed amendment be inconsistent with the original return, and take away the foundation of the suit or motion. Stone v. Wilson, 10 Gratt. 533, citing the principal case, and Wardsworth v. Miller, 4 Gratt. 99 (see also, foot-note to this case). To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Stots v. Collins & Co., 33 Va. 429, 2 S. E. Rep. 737.

On a motion to set aside a judgment and all the proceedings subsequent to the return of the summons on account of the defective return thereof, the sheriff may amend his return, on leave obtained from the court for that purpose, and thus cure the defect. To this effect, the principal case is cited in Goolsby v. St. John, 25 Gratt. 160; foot-note to Walker v. Com., 18 Gratt. 14.

See further on this subject, monographic note on "Amendments" appended to Snead v. Coleman, 7 Gratt. 300.

†Same—Conclusiveness.—In McClung v. McWhorter, 47 W. Va. 150, 34 S. E. Rep. 741, BRANNON, J., speaking for the court, said: "The proposition is to deny the facts stated in the sheriff's return. In many states this can be done, but in this state a sheriff's return on process emanating from the courts (judicial process) cannot be contradicted by parties or privies in its statement of such facts as the law requires him to state make the return good. The party must, for reparation of his injury, look to an action against the sheriff on his bond for false return. This may seem hard, but public policy requires, for stability of judicial proceedings, that the return of the sworn officer stand. It is a long-established rule with us, and based on sound principles and policy. Its reason, drawn from the United States supreme court, is ably defended in Preston v. Kindrick, 49 Va. 700, 27 S. E. Rep. 588, refusing relief in equity against a decree by default where relief was asked on the ground of false return. I will only refer to the cases: Goodall v. Stuart, 2 Hen. & M. 112; Smith v. Triplett, 4 Leigh 590;

Judgment on Assigned Bond—Satisfaction—Forthcoming Bond.—The taking of a forthcoming bond, on a judgment and execution against the obligor of an assigned bond, is not such a satisfaction of the judgment, as will preclude the assignees from having recourse against the assignors.

Same—Execution Nulla Bona—Right of Assignee against Assignor.—When assignees have recovered judgment on the assigned bond, and sued execution against the obligor, and that execution is returned nulla bona, they are entitled to recourse against the assignors; and it is no defence for the assignors to show neglect or malfeasance in the sheriff; the assignors, as parties injured, may sue the sheriff for such misconduct; the assignees are not bound to sue him, before they have recourse against the assignors, upon the contract of assignment.

Assumpsit by Triplett & Neale against Smith & Rickard in the circuit court of Fauquier. The original declaration contained a special count stating, in substance, that the defendants assigned a bond of one Wyatt to the plaintiffs for valuable consideration; and the plaintiffs, as assignees of the defendants, promptly commenced and diligently prosecuted a suit against Wyatt on the bond, in the 591 circuit court of *Fauquier, recovered a judgment, and sued out a fieri facias thereon, which was put into the hands of the sheriff of Fauquier, and by him levied on the property of Wyatt, who thereupon gave a bond with surety, for the forthcoming of the property at the time and place appointed for the sale thereof, which was returned forfeited; and execution on the forthcoming bond being afterwards awarded, the plaintiffs thereupon sued out a fieri facias against Wyatt and Holmes his surety in the forthcoming bond, which was put into the hands of Smith, deputy of Edmunds, sheriff of Fauquier; who made the following return thereon—"This execution, together with sundry other executions, was levied on one negro man slave, the property of Holmes [the surety] and after deducting the amount of other executions entitled to priority to this, and the sheriff's commissions, there remained the sum of 45 dollars, which I have paid to J. G. the plaintiffs' attorney; and I have made the further sum of 14 dollars, which I am ready to satisfy after deducting my commission; which latter sum is the proceeds of the sale of the said Holmes's property, contained in his schedule when he took the oath of an insolvent debtor under a ca. sa. in another case, but of a date subsequent to this execution; 1st August 1822." By reason whereof the defendants became liable to pay the plaintiffs the balance of the sum mentioned in Wyatt's bond so assigned to them, and being so liable, in consideration thereof, assumed to pay the same &c. To this special count, there were added the common money counts, 1. for money had and received; 2. for money lent and advanced; and 3. for money paid, laid out and expended. The defendants pleaded the general issue, and the statute of limitations.

At the trial of the issues, the plaintiffs having proved the case alleged in the special count of the declaration, and given in evidence the return of the deputy sheriff Smith on the execution upon the forthcoming bond (the same which was literally copied in that count) called Smith, the deputy, as a witness, to prove the insolvency of Wyatt, the principal *debtor; but the court rejected him as incompetent. There was, then, verdict for the defendants. The plaintiffs moved the court to set it aside, and direct a new trial, upon the ground that the testimony of Smith had been improperly excluded; and the court did set aside the verdict, and directed a new trial.

And on the same day, the court, on the motion of Triplett & Neale, gave leave to the deputy sheriff to amend his return on their execution against Wyatt and Holmes on the forthcoming bond (though more than five years had now elapsed since the original return was made) by adding, immediately after the date thereof [see the copy of it in the statement of the declaration] the following words—"And no property of the said Wyatt found to levy this execution on." And, at the same time, the court gave the plaintiffs leave to amend their declaration.

The amended declaration was the same as the other, except that in the recital of the sheriff's return on the execution on the forthcoming bond, the words above mentioned, just added thereto, by way of amendment, with leave of court, were recited as part of the return.

The defendants put in a general demurrer to the amended declaration, and pleaded the general issue, and the statute of limitations.

The court overruled the demurrer. And upon the trial of the issues, four bills of exceptions were filed by the defendants, to opinions of the court.

1. The first stated, that the plaintiffs to sustain the issues on their part, offered in evidence, the bond of Wyatt, on which was indorsed an assignment to them by the defendants for value received, and the record of the proceedings in their suit against Wyatt on the bond, which now corresponded exactly with the statement thereof in the first count of the amended declaration; the return of the deputy sheriff Smith, upon the execution on the forthcoming bond, as now amended by leave of the court, and as it was set forth in that count, being given in evidence as part 593 of the record. *Whereupon, the counsel for the defendants objected to the words added by the amendment to the original return, as above mentioned, going to the jury as evidence in support of either the first or the second count in the declaration; but the court overruled the objection, admitted the evidence, and instructed the jury, that the amended return was conclusive evidence of the insolvency of Wyatt, unless they should believe from the evidence, that the said return was fraudulent Bowyer v. Knapp, 15 W. Va. 277; Stewart v. Stewart, 27 W. Va. 168 (syll. point 10); Rader v. Adamson, 37 W. Va. 582, 16 S. E. Rep. 806; Peck v. Chambers, 44 W. Va. 270, 28 S. E. Rep. 706; Ramsburg v. Kline, 98 W. Va. 466, 31 S. E. Rep. 608. This doctrine does not apply to notices to take depositions, or other notices given by parties, nor to returns by private parties. Bowyer v. Knapp and Chambers v. Peck, supra. I remark, too, that where a sutor colludes with the officer to make a false return, it is not conclusive. That is the exercise of jurisdiction to annul a judgment for fraud.

Judgment on Assigned Bond—Satisfaction—Forthcoming Bond.—See principal case cited in Garland v. Lynch, 1 Rob. 566.

lent or collusive (of which the defendants offered no evidence); to which opinion the defendants excepted.

2. They then offered evidence to prove that Wyatt had, up to the return day of the plaintiffs' execution on the forthcoming bond, and for a long time afterwards continued to have, sufficient property in his possession, of which the debt, interest &c. in the execution mentioned could have been levied; but the court rejected this evidence; and the defendants excepted.

3. The plaintiffs having offered in evidence, a copy of a writ of ca. sa. sued out by one Loyd against Holmes (Wyatt's surety in the forthcoming bond) which appeared to have been served on Holmes after the plaintiffs' execution on the forthcoming bond against Wyatt and Holmes was in the sheriff's hands, and before the return day thereof, and on which ca. sa. Holmes took the oath of insolvency; and having also offered in evidence, along with this ca. sa. a copy of the schedule of Holmes's effects surrendered on his taking the oath of insolvency; the defendants, thereupon, offered evidence to prove, that Holmes had, at the time he took the oath, and long afterwards continued to have, other property, besides that mentioned in his schedule, sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' execution; but the court rejected this evidence. The defendants excepted.

4. They then offered evidence to prove, that the plaintiffs' execution on the forthcoming bond, against Wyatt and Holmes, had been in fact levied by the sheriff on a slave of sufficient value to satisfy the debt, which slave was afterwards 594 *discharged by the sheriff, without the plaintiffs' consent; but the court rejected this evidence also; and the defendants excepted.

There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs, for 129 dollars with interest &c. to which this court, on the petition of the defendants, allowed a supersedeas.

Stanard, for the plaintiff in error, insisted, 1. That the court ought not to have set aside the verdict rendered at the first trial on the original pleadings; for, he said, the deputy sheriff Smith was an incompetent witness to prove the insolvency of Wyatt, since proof of that fact was necessary to exonerate himself from the charge of neglect of duty, or of malfeasance in office, for which he was liable to an action at the suit of the plaintiffs. 2. That, at the time the action was brought, there was no good cause of action, inasmuch as the sheriff's return on the execution on the forthcoming bond, did not shew that Wyatt was insolvent. The amendment of the return, after the action brought, could not suffice to maintain it. Indeed, the leave for the sheriff to make the amendment of his return, was asked for the sole purpose of procuring matter necessary to maintain the action already pending; and the court ought not to have permitted such an amendment to be made, to answer such a purpose. 3. That the judgment recovered against Wyatt on the assigned bond, was completely satisfied and extinguished by the forthcoming bond; and if the forthcoming bond was insufficient to secure the debt, the sheriff was liable to Triplett & Neal for taking 'insufficient security. They, and they alone, had remedy on the forthcoming bond; they, and they alone, had remedy against the sheriff for taking an insufficient bond: the assignors, certainly, were not entitled to institute any proceedings on the forthcoming bond, or against the sheriff on account of its insufficiency. 4. That the sheriff's return, that Wyatt was insolvent, especially as the return, in that particular, was made ex post facto to fit the plaintiffs' case, ought not to have been taken as conclusive evidence of the *fact of Wyatt's insolvency; and the proof of his solvency offered by the defendants ought to have been admitted. 5. That, as it appeared by the plaintiffs' own shewing, that a ca. sa. sued out by another creditor, had been served on Holmes, the surety of Wyatt in the forthcoming bond, while Triplett & Neale's execution thereon was in the sheriff's hands, which, therefore, bound all his effects; and as it appeared by the return on Triplett & Neale's execution, that the effects surrendered in Holmes's schedule had been sold to satisfy the ca. sa. creditor, in the first place, and only 14 dollars, the balance of the proceeds, had been applied to the credit of Triplett & Neale's execution, whereas the whole of the proceeds ought to have been paid to them; here was clear proof, by the plaintiff's own shewing, that they had not pursued their remedy on the forthcoming bond, as efficiently as they might and ought to have done, before they had recourse to their assignors, Smith & Rickard. And 6. That as the assignors by the contract of assignment, in effect, only warranted the solvency of Wyatt the obligor, the evidence offered to prove, that Triplett & Neale's execution on the forthcoming bond, had been actually levied on a slave, and that this property was released by the sheriff, ought to have been admitted. It would have established the solvency of the debtors beyond question; and it would have shewn, that the sheriff had made himself liable to the plaintiffs, for the whole debt. They ought to have pursued the remedy which the law gave them against the sheriff, and which must have been amply sufficient.

Leigh, for the defendant in error, answered, 1. That the verdict on the first trial was properly set aside, on the ground that the testimony of Smith the deputy sheriff to prove the insolvency of Wyatt, had been excluded. Smith was a competent witness: he stood perfectly indifferent between the parties: if Wyatt was in fact insolvent, that would be a defence for him at the suit of either party; if he was solvent, either party, the defendants as well as the plaintiffs, might maintain an action against him for neglect of official *duty. 2. He said that, though in an action by the assignee against the assignor of a bond, the insolvency of the obligor may be proved by other evidence than the return of nulla bona on an execution against him, yet the assignor has a right to demand such a return, if it be true. The fact of the obligor's insolvency, was the foundation of an assignee's right to recourse against the assignor, and, in this case, the fact existed, if at all, before the action brought; and the amended return was only that evidence of the pre-existing fact, which the assignees had a right to require from the sheriff. 3. The forthcoming bond is nothing but part of our process of execution; neither Triplett & Neale nor the sheriff could have prevented Wyatt from giving it; nor was it true, that the sheriff was liable if he took surety in the bond who turned out afterwards to be insufficient; he was liable only in case the surety was insufficient at the time he was received as such. 4. The sheriff's return that Wyatt was insolvent was conclusive; Stuart v. Goodall, 2 Hen. & Munf. 105. The evidence offered of the solvency of Wyatt and of his surety Holmes, was nothing to the purpose, unless it was also proved that this was known to the plaintiffs; and if such evidence as the court excluded were admissible, an assignee, after having exerted the utmost diligence without effect, might be surprised, in his action against the assignor, at the trial, and defeated, by evidence of the solvency of the obligor. 5. As to the other matters which Smith & Rickard, in the court below, attempted to set up in their defence, he said, they amounted at the most to this, that the sheriff had been guilty of such gross neglect or malfeasance in office, as made him liable to Triplett & Neale for the debt. Now, in the first place, it was not pretended that Triplett & Neale had been apprised of this misconduct of the sheriff, though it seemed Smith & Rickard were; and, in the next place, if the sheriff had made a false return as to the insolvency of Wyatt, or been guilty of any misconduct or neglect, Smith & Rickard were parties aggrieved thereby, as well as Triplett & Neale, and had as clear a right to an 597 action against him. *1 Rev. Code, ch. 78, § 17, p. 280, ch. 134, § 48, p. 542. And then the question was, whether the assignees were bound to resort to and exhaust their remedy against the sheriff, before they could have recourse to the assignors? or had a right to recourse against the assignors immediately, leaving them to pursue their remedy against the sheriff? The assignees were not bound to exhaust every possible remedy against the obligor; much more were they not bound to prosecute their remedy against the sheriff; especially, when it did not appear that they were apprised of his having made himself liable, till their assignors alleged the fact in their defence at the trial. According to the objections of this court, the assignees had used such due diligence in their effort to recover the debt of Wyatt the obligor, as entitled them to recourse against the assignors. Mackie v. Davis, 2 Wash. 219; Stuart v. Goodall, 2 Hen. & Munf. 105; Barksdale v. Fenwick, Id. 113, in note; Harrison v. Raine, 5 Munf. 456; Caton & Veale v. Lenox, 5 Rand. 31.

CARR, J. The assignee of a bond or note must use due diligence to recover from the obligor or maker, before he can resort to the assignor. What is due diligence, has been left by the court to depend on the particular circumstances of each case. Generally speaking, the assignee must sue; must pursue a judicious course of proceeding; obtain a judgment, and the return of nulla bona on a fi. fa. These seem to be the general rules established by the cases. The exceptions to them, it is unnecessary to state. It is truly said by judge Roane, in Mackie v. Davis, that "the assignee of a bond acquires a legal right to bring suit upon it, and to receive the money, discharged from any control of the assignor over the subject." It is this legal right, which imposes on the assignee the duty of pursuing (as the same judge styles it) a judicious course of proceeding; by which, I presume, is meant, that he shall take such steps for the collection of the debt, as a prudent obligee would generally pursue.

598 *In the case before us, there was a judgment and execution, a forthcoming bond taken, and an execution on that. The first return on this execution was certainly not such as, of itself, to establish the insolvency of the obligors in the forthcoming bond; but the court permitted the sheriff to amend his return; and this, I think, it had a right to do, though it was after the lapse of five years, and after a verdict for the defendants at a former trial, and a new trial granted in this cause. The amended return, if it be taken to relate back to the date of the first (as I suppose it does) amounts to a return of nulla bona as to Wyatt; and the case of Stuart v. Goodall decides, that the assignor, in a suit against him, shall not be permitted to introduce proof to contradict such a return. But what was the return as to Holmes? So far from amounting to a return of nulla bona, it shewed that there were goods of Holmes, and that this execution was levied on some, but not on all of them. This return then does not establish that sort of insolvency of Holmes, which the court will not suffer to be contradicted. The proof, indeed, that at this time Holmes had property sufficient to satisfy this execution, other than that levied on, would stand perfectly well with the sheriff's return. Such proof the defendants offered, but the court excluded it. In this, I think, the court erred; for such proof was surely relevant both to the question of insolvency and of due diligence. What bearing it might have on those questions, was for the jury, with whom it remained to decide upon all the circumstances, whether the plaintiffs had made out a case which entitled them to come upon the assignors. Farther, to prove that while this same execution was in the hands of the sheriff, there was other property of Holmes, the defendants offered evidence to prove, that this execution was levied upon a slave of value sufficient to satisfy the execution, and discharged by the sheriff without the assent of the plaintiffs: and this too was excluded by the court, though it did not contradict the sheriff's return, and bore, I think, upon both questions before the jury. It cious course of proceeding, would not have required the assignees to take steps against the sheriff, before coming upon the assignors? I do not understand that any case in this court has gone so far as to say that the assignee, while holding the uncontrolled ownership and management of the debt, may pass by the grossest blunders and misconduct of law officers; conduct rendering them unquestionably liable; conduct which clearly prevented the making the money out of the debtor;—and come directly upon the assignor. I have seen no such case; and I think it would be bad policy, as well as hard measure; it would tempt the assignee to connive at the malpractices of sheriffs, and to hurry over in the most careless and summary way, the process which was to bring him upon the assignor. The assignor is quite as much entitled to the favor of the court as the assignee. He gives the whole control of the case out of his hands, and before he is compelled to pay the debt, is entitled to demand proof, that after an honest and diligent pursuit of his debtor, the money cannot be made. I am of opinion that the judgment should be reversed.

TUCKER, P. In the case of Mackie v. Davis, this court, in establishing the liability of the assignor to the assignee, who after due diligence to recover from the obligor has failed to receive the amount of an assigned bond, carefully avoided, nevertheless, to lay down any rule as to what amounts to due diligence. The court has since, with equal caution, declined the attempt to draw the precise line at which the assignor's liability commences. It is wise, I think, in their successors to follow the example. The demarcation will best be made by successive decisions, which will serve as landmarks to those who engage in the traffic for bonds. The decisions of the courts on such questions, if they do not stand upon the elevated ground of being rules of property, *are at least the law of contracts. Those who buy and those who sell, look for the obligations which are assumed by the assignor, to those decisions. Hence the principle stare decisis, is peculiarly applicable to cases of this description. Upon these considerations, I shall take the case of Stuart v. Goodall, which has never been impugned, as not now to be questioned; modified at least as it is by the opinion of judge Roane in the case of Barksdale v. Fenwick. And on the same ground, I shall consider the cases of Caton & Veale v. Lenox, and Harrison v. Raine, as not to be now questioned. With these preliminaries, let us proceed to the consideration of this case. It comes to us upon exceptions to the opinions of the court who tried the cause, and those opinions constitute therefore the subject of examination.

1. I do not perceive, that, there was an exception to granting the new trial, but as this matter was made a subject of discussion, I shall observe, that I think the new trial was rightly granted to the plaintiffs, because the verdict had been found under an erroneous instruction of the court. The return of the sheriff as originally made, having omitted to return nulla bona as to Wyatt, the plaintiffs were indeed without the benefit of that conclusive return; but, as the action might have been sustained by proof of insolvency, without even the institution of a suit, and as such proof is also a sufficient excuse even for negligence in the prosecution of one, if it could have been sufficiently made out that no diligence would have been availing, I think it clear, that the plaintiffs should have been permitted to prove that Wyatt was in truth insolvent when their execution issued.

2. Upon the second trial, the amended return was produced in evidence, and was admitted. I think it was properly admitted. It did not give a cause of action by relation, but it was evidence of a fact which existed before the suit, and which might have been proved by other evidence. The plaintiffs, moreover, had a right to have had this return of the sheriff as to the fact, before the suit brought, and were therefore entitled to it nunc pro tunc: and there is less reason *for the objection to its admissibility, since it did not contradict a former return, but only supplied an omission in it.

3. This return having been admitted, the defendant then offered to prove that Wyatt at the date of that execution had other property. This evidence was rejected, and I think properly. It is not stated, that the property so supposed to exist, was known either to the sheriff or to the assignees; and the fact, therefore, did not go to fix a malfeasance on the sheriff or negligence in the plaintiffs. Nothing is more possible, than that a man may have property unknown to the sheriff and the assignee, though the sheriff may honestly and truly have returned nulla bona as to him. The assignor, as judge Roane tells us, may well be presumed to know more of the obligor and his property than the assignee. It was, probably, for that reason among others, that in Stuart v. Goodall, the court justified the peremptory refusal of the county court of Henrico, to permit the introduction of evidence to prove that Beverley, the obligor, had goods and effects sufficient to satisfy the execution at the time of the sheriff's return. Judge Tucker approved this refusal, expressly on the ground, that the admission of the evidence would have been to permit the return to be contested, whereas it was incontrovertible between the assignee and assignor. Judge Roane and judge Fleming concurred in refusing it, though upon grounds somewhat different, and perhaps yet stronger. They seem to have considered the return conclusive upon the rights of the parties, unless the assignee had been proved to have known that there was other property, or that any other execution would probably have produced the money. Many a bond has been bought and sold on the faith of that case, which may therefore be considered as entitled to peculiar respect. It has been familiarly considered as the law of the subject, for more than twenty years.

4. The plaintiffs having introduced the return upon the execution against Holmes, shewing that only a certain sum could be made out of him, and proof that between the date *of the issue of their execution and its return, he had taken the oath of insolvency, the defendant then offered evidence to prove that Holmes had other property, without however offering to prove that the sheriff or assignee knew of it. I can see no material distinction between this and the case arising under the last mentioned bill of exceptions. In that, the return which it was proposed to controvert, was a return of nulla bona; in this, it is the return that the defendant in the execution had taken the oath of insolvency. He might, it is true, have been made to swear out again under a ca. sa. issued at the suit of Triplett & Neale; but there was no obligation to sue that ca. sa. under the circumstances, nor could the proof that he had other property be proper, unless accompanied by proof that the assignees knew of it. Without such knowledge, they could not be charged with want of due diligence.

5. As a last effort the defendants offered evidence to prove, that the execution on the delivery bond was levied on a slave who was discharged by the sheriff without the assent of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs, then, were in no fault. The sheriff, if the fact was so, was guilty of a malfeasance, and is liable for the debt. To whom? That depends precisely upon the question, whether, in case of the sheriff's malfeasance, the assignee is or is not bound to pursue him? If he is not bound to pursue him, then the wrong done is a wrong done to the assignor, who may have his action on the case. My own opinion is, that where the debt is not made, and where the sheriff is only responsible for malfeasance, the assignee is not bound to pursue him. It would clog and embarrass assignments too much to require this; and, moreover, it is better that the party ultimately interested in establishing his defaults, should institute the proceeding for the purpose. This court seems, indeed, to have been averse to requiring of the assignee more than a diligent pursuit of the obligor, and has exonerated him from the necessity of pursuing collateral, uncertain, and merely contingent remedies. Hence the decision, that 603 though there be special bail, and though there has been a ca. sa. returned non est inventus (which prima facie makes the bail liable) yet it is not necessary to pursue him; for, peradventure, he might still relieve himself by bringing in the principal before the return of the first scire facias executed, or of the second returned nihil. Such was the decision in Caton & Veale v. Lenox. And if the assignee is not bound to pursue the bail, even where there is a moral certainty that he must be fixed with the debt (for, in that case, Hartshorne was proved to be out of the country, and resident in Baltimore), I cannot perceive the propriety of requiring him to proceed against a sheriff, in order to take the chance of fixing upon him a malfeasance, which may charge him with the debt.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion, that there is no error in the proceedings of the circuit court, and that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

The Farmers Bank v. Clarke.

November, 1833.

Debt on Note—Statute of Limitations—Subsequent Conditional Promise.*—In debt on a promissory note negotiable at bank, by holders against indorsers, the indorser pleads the general issue, with leave to give the statute of limitations in evidence; and, at the trial, the plaintiffs prove a conditional promise made by the indorser to pay the debt, within the period of limitation: HELD, such conditional promise does not suffice to take the case out of the statute, unless performance of the condition be shewn.

Debt in the circuit court of Henrico, brought by the president, directors and company of the farmers bank of Virginia, indorsees and holders, against Frederick Clarke, the maker, and Miles Bott 604 and Colin Clarke, indorsers, of a *note negotiable and payable at the bank, for 1200 dollars. The action was founded on the statutes of Virginia, giving an action against the maker and indorsers of such notes jointly; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 126, § 2, p. 485; 2 Id. ch. 196, § 15, art. 13, p. 90. Frederick Clarke confessed judgment. The writ abated as to Bott, by the return, that he was "no inhabitant." The defendant Colin Clarke pleaded nil debet; and the plaintiffs agreed, that he might give in evidence under that plea, any matter which he might give in evidence under a plea of the statute of limitations.

At the trial the plaintiffs filed a bill of exceptions, stating, that the plaintiffs offered in evidence the note on which the action was founded, which was dated the 12th February 1819, and payable sixty days after date, with two credits indorsed thereon, one for 187 dollars received from W. Clarke trustee, dated the 11th June 1825, and the other for 564 dollars received from J. Brockenbrough and other trustees, dated the 13th March 1826; and proved the making of the note by Frederick Clarke, and the indorsements thereof by Bott and Colin Clarke; and that the note had been discounted at the bank for the accommodation of the maker, and had been protested for non-payment at maturity, and due notice of the protest given to the defendant Colin Clarke. And, then, to take the case out of the statute of limitations, on which that defendant relied, the plaintiffs introduced a witness, who testified, that some years after the protest of the note, the defendant offered a note at the same bank for discount for his own accommodation, which the bank refused to discount; and shortly after this, and within five years next before the commencement of this action, the defendant asked the witness (who was a director of the bank at the time) why his note had been rejected; to which the witness answered, that he had voted for rejecting it, because the defendant was on the protest book of the bank, alluding to the protested note of Frederick Clarke indorsed by Bott and the defendant Colin Clarke, on which this action was brought; and thereupon, the 605 defendant said, "that the bank was well secured in that case, for it had a deed of trust on Frederick Clarke's real property, as collateral security, and if the bank would sell, or when it should sell, that property, should it not sell for enough to discharge the debt, he, the defendant, would pay the balance; that the property was sufficient to pay Frederick Clarke's bank debt, and he would pay the debt for the property." Whereupon the court, upon the motion of the defendant's counsel, instructed the jury, that if they should find from the evidence, that the defendant's supposed admissions were to the effect, that, upon condition the plaintiffs would resort to the collateral security they held for Frederick Clarke's debt, he would pay any balance that might remain unsatisfied, then such conditional admission was not sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations, unless the plaintiffs should prove that they had performed the condition. And then the plaintiffs' counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, that if an indorser of a note acknowledges that there is a subsisting debt, but says, that before he will pay it, the holders must resort to collateral security given by the maker or any other indorser, to which, in point of law, the holders were not bound to resort before they could recover on the note, this does not prevent the acknowledgment of the debt from taking the case out of the statute of limitations; but the court refused to give this instruction to the jury, and instructed them, that if they should find from the evidence, that the defendant's acknowledgment was unconditional, such acknowledgment was sufficient to take the case out of the statute; but if they should find that the supposed acknowledgment of the defendant was dependent on any act to be performed by the plaintiffs, such conditional acknowledgment was not sufficient for that purpose, unless the plaintiffs proved performance of the condition. To these opinions of the court the plaintiffs excepted.

There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant; from which the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

606 *Daniel, for the appellants.

The attorney general, for the appellee.

CARR, J. I think the instructions given by the circuit court to the jury were correct. It is not consonant with either law or reason, that when a man makes a promise or acknowledgment, you shall take a part of it, and reject the rest; that when he says, "if you will do this or that, I will pay you," you shall discard the condition, and make his promise unconditional. I know there are many old cases, which consider the statute as founded on the presumption of payment; that whatever repels that presumption, is, in legal effect, a promise to pay the debt; and that, though such acknowledgment is accompanied with only a conditional promise, or even a refusal to pay, the law considers the condition or refusal void, and the acknowledgment itself as an unconditional answer to the statute. But the more recent, and, I think, the more rational, decisions take a different view of the case. They consider this a statute of repose, which ought to receive from the courts a fair and just support. They consider the acknowledgment a new promise, not a continuance of the old; and that to revive the debt, it must be unqualified and unconditional. This is decided in Clementson v. Williams, 8 Cranch 72. And again in Wetzell v. Bussard, 11 Wheat. 314, chief justice Marshall, delivering the opinion of the court, and speaking of the acknowledgment, says, "If it be connected with circumstances which in any manner affect the claim, or if it be conditional, it may amount to a new assumption, for which the old debt is a sufficient consideration; or if it be construed to revive the original debt, that revival is conditional, and the performance of the condition, or a readiness to perform it, must be shewn." In Bell v. Morrison, 1 Peters 351, 362, the court after repeating what it had decided in the cases before cited, says, "We adhere to the doctrine thus stated, and think it the only exposition of the statute which is consistent with its true object and import. If the bar is sought to be removed 607 *by the proof of a new promise, that promise, as a new cause of action, ought to be proved, in a clear and explicit manner, and be in terms unequivocal and determinate; and if any conditions are annexed, they ought to be shewn to be performed." In Moore v. Bank of Columbia, 6 Peters 92, the court reassert verbatim, the doctrine of the former cases, and consider it the settled doctrine of the court. The supreme court of Massachusetts, in Bangs v. Hall, 2 Pick. 368, after reviewing the principal cases, held, that to take a case out of the statute, there must be an unqualified acknowledgment, not only of the debt as originally due, but that it continues so; and, if there has been a conditional promise, it must be shewn that the condition has been performed. The same doctrine has been held in New York; Sands v. Gelston, 15 Johns. Rep. 511; Roosevelt v. Marks, 6 Johns. Ch. Rep. 266, 290. And in Pennsylvania; Brown v. Campbell, 1 Serg. & Rawle 176; Fries v. Boisselet, 9 Id. 128. If I were to go into the English authorities, the field would be still wider: but I will not. These cases assuredly sustain the correctness of the instructions of the circuit court in this case, and shew that the loose conversation of Clarke with the bank director, was wholly insufficient to take the case out of the statute.

It is not necessary to examine the more general proposition discussed in the argument, whether in debt on a promissory note, any subsequent acknowledgment can be resorted to, to take the case out of the statute. However, as the case of Butcher v. Hixton, [ante] in which that point was decided, has excited some remark, I shall barely say, that the case was very ably argued; that for myself, I examined it very laboriously; and that on a reexamination, I continue to think the opinion there given correct, whether we take it upon the pleadings, upon the plain meaning of the statute, upon principle, or upon authority.

CABELL, J. I am of opinion that a conditional promise to pay a debt, will not take the case out of the statute of performance of the condition. It is competent to him who makes a promise, to annex to it what terms or conditions he pleases; and it would be unreasonable to permit him in whose favor it was made, to avail himself of the benefit of it discharged of the condition. The point has been repeatedly adjudged in the supreme court of the U. States. On this ground, I am for affirming the judgment. Whether a promise, sufficient to take a case out of the statute of limitations, operates as a revival or continuation of the old contract, or as a new, distinct and substantive contract, founded on the old consideration, or whether there is any difference between the action of debt and the action of assumpsit, as relates to this subject, I do not deem it necessary to decide at present; since, in any aspect of this case, the judgment is right.

BROOKE, J. I concurred in the opinions of the president and judge Carr in Butcher v. Hixton, solely on the ground, that the acknowledgment of Hart, the principal in the note in that case, could not be considered as a waiver of the statute of limitations by Butcher, the surety. I did not think it material to decide any other point made in the argument. Even in an action of assumpsit, such an acknowledgment by the principal, would not have been considered as a waiver of the statute by the surety. The vacillating decisions of the english judges on this subject are very much to be regretted; and it would be better that the legislature should interpose, and restore the statute to its original object, by an enactment that would exclude every species of acknowledgment or promise, not made in writing. If the acknowledgment stated in the demurrer to evidence in Butcher v. Hixton had been by Hart and Butcher, jointly, it would not have repelled the statute. It was a mere acknowledgment that the debt was justly due: but, as is said by chief justice Marshall in Clementson v. Williams, this would not be enough, as the statute was not enacted to protect persons from claims fictitious in their origin, but from "antient claims, whether well or ill founded. The acknowledgment in Butcher v. Hixton, being defective in two respects, as a waiver of the statute, it was unnecessary to decide the question, whether it was within the issue in that case. My impression is, that if the acknowledgment had been made by Hart and Butcher both, it would have been within the issue of debt or no debt, which is the issue on the plea of nil debet. The cases on this subject are collected in Blanchard's treatise on limitations, pp. 128-140.

As to the case now before us, the case of Wetzell v. Bussard, in the supreme court of the U. States, is conclusive. In that case as in this, the acknowledgment was conditional, and it was held that the plaintiff ought to prove performance or readiness to perform the condition, else it was unavailing to repel the statute. Here, no such performance of the condition has been shewn. I think the judgment must be affirmed.

TUCKER, P. Though I think it very clear that the judgment in this case must be affirmed, without relying on the opinions expressed by a part of the court in the case of Butcher v. Hixton, yet I think it proper to remark as to that case, 1st, That it is not conceived to go farther than to establish the necessity of bringing assumpsit, or adding a count on indebitatus assumpsit to the declaration in debt, where reliance is to be placed upon an acknowledgment or promise to avoid the bar of the statute of limitations.—2ndly, That however technical this may seem, yet, similar technicalities are to be found in innumerable decisions of this court, and are necessary indeed to preserve distinct the line of demarcation between different actions, and to prevent the whole system of pleading from being thrown into chaos: see Cooke v. Sims, 2 Call 39; Young v. Gregorie, 3 Id. 446; Taylor v. Rainbow, 2 Hen. & Munf. 423; Moore v. Dawney, 3 Id. 127; Smith v. Segar, Id. 394; Syme v. Griffin, 4 Id. 277; Kirtley v. Deck, 2 Munf. 10; Wilson v. Crowdhill, Id. 302; Hall v. Smith, 610 3 Id. 550; Sexton v. Holmes, Id. 566; Beverly v. Holmes, 4 Id. 95; Donaghe v. Rankin, Id. 261; Moseley v. Jones, 5 Id. 23.—3rdly, That no serious inconvenience can be sustained, even in causes now pending, since in every case, upon motion, a second count in debt upon the new promise or acknowledgment, or a count in indebitatus assumpsit, may be added for the amendment of the declaration.—4thly, and lastly, That by considering the promise or acknowledgment as a new promise, it binds none but the promiser, and thus avoids the unreasonable principle, that after the liability of the surety in a note, is completely taken away by the statute, it shall be restored to its full force against him, by the acknowledgment or promise of the principal alone; Whitcomb v. Whiting, 2 Doug. 652, which though questioned in Atkins's ex'ors v. Tredgold, 2 Barn. & Cress. 23, 9 Eng. C. L. R. 12, seems to have been since approved by some judges; Perham v. Raynal, 2 Bing. 306; 9 Eng. C. L. R. 413.

With respect to this case I have no doubt. Where the plaintiff relies on a conditional promise to take the debt out of the statute, he must shew the condition performed, before he can avail himself of the promise. This position is sustained by many authorities; and though in some, the condition insisted on does not appear to me, to be, properly speaking, any condition at all, yet where, as in this case, there is a real and not a mere nominal condition, the principle seems to be unquestionable. Thus although a promise "to pay when I am able," involves no real condition, and should therefore be taken to be a promise to pay absolutely, yet a promise to pay "if a collateral security should be first resorted to and prove deficient," is, to every intent and purpose, a conditional promise, and must be performed, before the party can be charged.

But it is said that this promise having been made before the expiration of the five years, the party was then bound, and had no right to clog the promise of payment with a condition. This would have been very true, had the suit been brought within the five years. But when after the lapse of five years, it became necessary for the plaintiff to lay hold of this promise, he must take it as he finds it: he must take it altogether; he cannot garble it. He may renounce it altogether or he may take it altogether; but it would be without example to permit him to take as much as would suit his purpose, and reject the rest.

The case of Hyeling v. Hastings, 1 Ld. Raym. 389, 421, justifies, I think, no such position. The remarks of lord Holt, when the case was first before the court, leaned that way: but on the final judgment, the court said, "Prove your debt and I will pay you, is as strong as an express promise, after the condition is performed; viz. the proof of the debt, which ought to be done in evidence upon the indebitatus assumpsit." As to the case of Scales v. Jacob, 3 Bing. 638, 13 Eng. C. L. R. 85, the court was divided on this point. It furnishes, therefore, no barrier to the free exercise of the judgment upon the question; and as I have already said, my mind is perfectly satisfied, that no conditional promise can take a debt out of the statute, unless the condition be performed; and even when performed, it must be considered as a new promise, and not as the debt, since the old debt was unclogged by the condition. The two contracts are radically and essentially different in this, that the one is conditional, the other without condition.

612 *Gholson v. Kendall & Co.

November, 1838.

Chancery Jurisdiction — Judgment — Injunction.* — A county court in chancery has no jurisdiction to stay proceedings at law on a judgment of a circuit court, by injunction; and if the county court issue such injunction, the circuit court ought to disregard it.

Kendall & Co. having recovered a judgment against Gholson, in the circuit court of Brunswick, and sued out a fieri facias thereon, which was levied on the property of Gholson, he gave a forthcoming bond, with sureties, for the delivery of the property at the time and place appointed for the sale thereof; and the forthcoming bond being returned forfeited, Kendall & Co. moved the court for award of execution thereon, against the principal and his sureties. The defence set up against this motion, was, that while the execution of Kendall & Co. against Gholson was in the sheriff's hands, and before the execution of the forthcoming bond, the county court of Brunswick, upon a bill in chancery there exhibited by Gholson, alleging grounds of relief in equity against the judgment, had allowed an injunction to inhibit Kendall & Co. from further proceedings on their judgment at law. This bill was still pending in the county court; and the record of the suit in the county court, was presented to the circuit court. It appeared, that the process of injunction had been served on Kendall & Co. on the same day on which the forthcoming bond was forfeited; and it was proved, that Kendall & Co. were not inhabitants of the county of Brunswick, but residents of the town of Petersburg. Gholson and his sureties opposed the award of execution on the forthcoming bond, on the ground that the injunction from the county court inhibited such further proceeding at law, but the circuit court disregarded the injunction, and awarded execution on the forthcoming bond. To this judgment, on the petition of Gholson, a supersedeas was allowed by this court.

613 *The cause was argued here by Taylor for the plaintiff in error, and the attorney general for the defendant, on two points:

I. Whether and how far, in any case, a court of law is bound to take notice of an injunction from a court of chancery, inhibiting proceedings at law? See Epes's adm'r v. Dudley, ante 145.

II. Whether a county court in chancery, is competent, upon a bill alleging grounds of relief in equity, to injoin further proceedings at law upon a judgment of a circuit court? the circuit court as constituted at the time, having no equitable jurisdiction, though as courts of common law jurisdiction, the circuit, were always superiour to the county, courts, and exercised appellate jurisdiction over their judgments at law. This point depended on the construction of the statutes concerning the equitable jurisdictions of the county courts sitting in chancery, and of the then superiour courts of chancery; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 66, § 27, 38, 61, pp. 201, 203, 209, ch. 71, § 7, 62, 75, pp. 246, 257, 260. The following cases were cited in the argument; Ambler v. Wyld, 2 Wash. 36; Ford v. Gardner, 1 Hen. & Munf. 72; Cocke v. Pollock, Id. 499, 515, 518; Paul v. Paul, 2 Id. 525; Hite v. Fitz Randolph, 1 Virg. Ca. 269; Wilson v. Stevenson's adm'r, 2 Call 217.

CARR, J. The only question which it is necessary to notice in this case, is, whether a county court in chancery can injoin the judgment of a superiour court of law? In support of this power, it was said, 1. that the terms of the law giving chancery jurisdiction to the county courts, are sufficiently broad to embrace it; and 2. that, in its exercise, there is nothing incongruous, because it is not an inferior court reversing the judgment of a superiour, but a court of equity viewing the controversy upon grounds of which the circuit court, being a court of common law jurisdiction only, from the nature of its powers, could take no notice. However true this last proposition may be, we must still consider *the question of power: did the legislature intend to give, and has it by the words of the statute given, to county courts, the power contended for?

We know that these tribunals are local; bounded, in their general jurisdiction, by the limits of their county. Is this equity power an exception? When a subsequent legislature uses the precise words of enactment used by a former, we must suppose that it uses them in the same sense. I have looked back to the revision of 1748, ch. 7, § 5, 5 Hen. Stat. at Large, p. 491, and I find the jurisdiction of the county courts thus expressed: "The justices of every county court, or any four of them as aforesaid, shall and may take cognizance of, and are hereby declared to have power, authority and jurisdiction, to hear and determine all causes whatsoever, at common law, or in chancery, within their respective counties;" and these precise words we find used in all the laws since. In some of the later revisions are added, "and all such other matters as by any particular statute is or shall be made cognizable therein." The power, however, of injoining judgments of the superiour courts of law, is not claimed under any particular statute made since; but is rested on the general words of this statute of 1748. Did the legislature of that day mean to give this power? If we look to the words themselves, they seem to me clearly to restrict the exercise of the powers given, to the county—"all causes at common law and in chancery within their respective counties." It will be observed, that the common law and chancery jurisdiction are given in the same words; and we know well, that their common law powers were so restricted, that they could issue no process of any kind beyond the county: even if a party resided in the county when the suit was brought and judgment obtained, but moved to another county before execution issued, no execution of any kind, could, under the powers here given, reach him. To effect this, a particular statute was necessary; acts of 1748, ch. 12, § 20, Id. p. 536, which provides, "that where judgment shall be obtained in any county 615 *or other inferiour court of record, for debt or damages, and the person against whom such judgment shall be obtained, shall remove himself and his effects, or shall reside, out of the limits of the jurisdiction of such court, it shall be lawful for the clerk of the court where judgment was given, at the request of the party for whom the same was rendered, to issue any writ of fi. fa. or ca. sa. &c. and to direct the same to the sheriff of any county within this dominion, where the defendant or debtor or his goods shall be found." And even this statute, because it mentioned only a fi. fa. and ca. sa. was considered to give no power to issue any other final process; and this defect was supplied by the act of 1772, ch. 5, 8 Hen. Stat. at Large, p. 516, the preamble of which runs thus: "Whereas the laws concerning executions are defective, in not authorizing the clerks of county courts, to issue all manner of legal and proper writs of execution, upon judgments, decrees in chancery and final orders, duly recovered and obtained in said courts, into other counties, as is done in writs of fi. fa. and ca. sa. &c." This law (it may also be remarked) gives the power of issuing into other counties, attachments against executors, administrators or guardians, who shall fail to account, when ordered so to do, by such court; shewing that the general words were so strictly confined to the limits of the county, as not to confer this power so necessary to that equitable jurisdiction which every county court exercises over these fiduciaries. In Epes v. Randolph, 2 Call 186, the president, speaking of certain judgments, says, "they were entered in July 1770, when an elegit could not issue upon them into any other county than York; and, therefore, in reason and justice, could only bind the lands in that county." Thus, we see how strictly confined to the limits of their county, was the common law jurisdiction of these courts, given by the exact words which conferred on them chancery jurisdiction. By what rule of construction can we extend them in this last case? I know of none. Look to the state of the courts, when this statute of 1748 passed; and let us ask, upon 616 what *ground of reason we can suppose, that the power to injoin the judgments of superiour courts of law, was meant to be given to county courts? There were none but county courts and the general court; and this last had a jurisdiction, both legal and equitable, covering the whole state, and express power is given to it to injoin judgments of the county courts. It could not, then, be imagined, that the county courts could injoin the judgments of the general court, the only superiour court then in being. As this law, therefore, in its origin, gave no such power, it seems to follow, that the same words, the same law, continued down to us, must mean the same thing now that it did at first. This seems to me decisive of the question.

*See generally, monographic note on "Jurisdiction" appended to Phippen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457; monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425; monographic note on "Injunctions" appended to Clayton v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518.

This view is certainly strengthened by the general understanding and practice of the country: for though, in a few cases, we have heard of this power being exercised, it was always looked upon as an extraordinary attempt; and the only case in which I have ever known it carried to a superiour court, was one in the superiour court of chancery of Clarkaburg, which decided against the power. But if it had been the general belief of the bar through the country, that the county courts had this power, such were the temptations, from the convenience and the facility of those tribunals, that we should have had a thousand instances of such injunctions.

Again, we know that a chancery court never grants an injunction without directing bond and security. Thus, in the chancery court law, it is said, that where an injunction shall be granted, the clerk shall indorse on the subpoena that the effect thereof shall be suspended until the party obtaining the same, shall give security in the office of the court in which the judgment, to be enjoined, shall have been obtained. This is the law of the superiour courts of chancery, who having jurisdiction to injoin the judgments of many law courts, it was necessary to designate where the bond should be given; and it is confined to the law court whose judgment was injoined. But when the law speaks 617 of the *power of the county courts to grant injunctions, it says, before an injunction shall issue, the party shall give bond and security, in the clerk's office, viz: of the county court granting the injunction. Why is this difference? Why can it be, but that the county court having power to injoin its own judgments only, when bond is given in its office, it must perforce be given in the office of the court, in which the judgment to be enjoined was obtained?

Other views taken from different clauses of the statutes, crowd upon me, shewing to my mind with equal clearness, that the legislature never dreamed of the county courts possessing this power; but I forbear to quote them. Though this point has never been brought directly before this court, I think it is clear from what was said in Cocke v. Pollock, 1 Hen. & Munf. 514, 518, that the court had no idea of such a power in the county courts. Judge Roane, in discussing the point that the location of the court whose judgment was enjoined, fixed the jurisdiction, says, "Prior to the establishment of this new system, the high court of chancery, could have granted injunctions to any judgment rendered within the limits of its jurisdiction; and this is now also the case with the several county courts in chancery, who grant injunctions to their own judgments, without inquiry, in either case, as to the residence of the defendant." And judge Fleming says, "Suppose that this suit instead of having been brought in the district court of Charlottesville, had been in the county court of Albemarle, which is held at the same place, and the defendant had shewn good equitable cause for enjoining the judgment, could not that county court with propriety, have enjoined the judgment, without regard to the residence of Pollock?" Now, why suppose the case brought in the county court, in order to predicate its power to enjoin, if it could enjoin the judgment of the district court held at the same place?

I am clear, upon the whole, that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

618 *CABELL, J. If it had pleased the legislature to confer power on the county courts, to enjoin the judgments of the superiour courts of law, I should see nothing in such a jurisdiction, inconsistent with the deference and submission due from an inferiour to a superiour court. For, in the exercise of this power, the county courts would act on grounds totally distinct from those which had been the foundation of the judgments of the superiour courts of law; the county courts acting solely on the equity, while superiour courts had acted only on the law of the case. But a careful examination of the various statutes has convinced me, that it was not the intention of the legislature, to give to the county courts any such power over the judgments of the superiour courts. I am for affirming the judgment.

BROOKE, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. I do not think it necessary to say any thing on the first point argued at the bar, in addition to what I said in Epes's adm'r v. Dudley, in regard to the obligation of a court of law to respect the process of a court of chancery, and to refuse its assistance to a party who is in the commission of a contempt of a coordinate branch of the judiciary.

It is sufficiently obvious, however, that if a county court has no power to enjoin the judgment of a superiour court, there can be no obligation in the latter to respect its process of injunction. The question then to be decided, is, has it such a power? I conceive it has not.

I do not mean to deny, that a county court may entertain jurisdiction of a cause on the chancery side of that court, although a judgment at law has been rendered in the superiour court between the same parties, and proceed to make a final decree perpetually enjoining the plaintiff at law from proceeding to enforce his judgment. Thus, if a party resident in Henrico, recovers a judgment on bond in the circuit court of that county, it cannot be denied, that 619 *the obligor may institute his suit in equity on the chancery side of the county court, alleging that the bond was given for usury or gambling, and so of no validity; and if such fact be established, I cannot doubt that the county court might by its final decree, after a full hearing of the parties, perpetually enjoin the plaintiff at law from farther proceeding. For by the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 71, § 7, the county court has general jurisdiction over all matters in equity within its jurisdiction; and thus has power to take cognizance of, and by consequence to pronounce the proper decree between, the parties in the cause. And in doing so, it would neither conflict with the power of the court of law, nor overrule its judgments. Its action would be in a different sphere, and its decision would be upon the equity between the parties, while the court of law had decided only upon the law of the case, as contradistinguished from its equity. These principles are too familiar to be dilated upon. Indeed, if they do not reconcile the action of the inferiour tribunal upon the matter of equity, with the action of the superiour upon the matter of law, it would be difficult to conceive, how the coequal tribunal of the superiour court of chancery can be justified in its assumption of equitable jurisdiction to arrest the judgments of the law courts, and that too after they have received the sanction of this tribunal superiour to them all.

But though a county court may, in a suit in equity, make a final decree perpetually enjoining the judgment of a circuit court of law, yet it does not follow that it has the right to issue, at the commencement of a suit in equity, its process of injunction, restraining the plaintiff at law from proceeding, until the merits of the case shall have been heard. This, though an ordinary power of a court of equity, and incidental to the equitable jurisdiction which it exercises, does not exist, I think, as between the county and the superiour courts: it does not exist so as to authorize the county courts to enjoin any other than their 620 own judgments, though *there can be no question of their power over them. I draw this inference from the following considerations.

The power to grant injunctions to judgments at law, has been regulated by the statute law of Virginia, for more than three fourths of a century (to go no farther back); acts of 1744, ch. 11, § 6, 1748, ch. 8, § 9, 5 Hen. Stat. at Large, pp. 241, 512. By these early provisions, it was generally declared, that before any injunction in chancery should be granted to stay proceedings at law, in any action, suit or judgment whatsoever, bond with good security should be given for the payment of the demand in case of the dissolution of the injunction. This principle, it is believed, has been steadfastly adhered to by the legislature, although in subsequent statutes, it has changed its form, from a general provision to a specific enactment as to each particular court. Thus, by the act of October 1787, ch. 9, § 4, 12 Hen. Stat. at Large, p. 467, concerning the court of chancery, it is provided that on all subpoenas of injunction awarded by that court, the clerk shall indorse that the effect of it is suspended until bond and security be given in the office of the court where the judgment was given; thus embracing all courts of law whether superior or inferior. In the year 1792, moreover, two other provisions are found as to this matter; the one as to the district courts, and the other as to the county courts. By the district court law, (1 Old Rev. Code, ch. 66, § 11, Pleasants' ed. p. 74,) it was provided, that the district courts, and the judges in vacation, should have the powers of the chancery court and of the chancellor, in injoining their own judgments, under the same rules and regulations as were prescribed for the court of chancery; that is to say, inter alia, upon the terms of requiring bond with security before their injunctions should have effect. And in the county court law of 1792 (Id. ch. 67, § 68, p. 92,) there was a provision as to injunctions, but limited and confined to injunctions to their own judgments. Until now, the provision had been general; but the legislature having vested this jurisdiction by *way of injunction in the district courts, there would have been no longer any sort of necessity for assuming the jurisdiction by the county courts, if they had been ever supposed to have had it. The clause of the county court law of 1792, therefore, looks only to this limited power of granting injunctions. It provides that before any injunction shall be granted to stay proceedings at law in any action, suit or judgment whatsoever, in any county or corporation court, the bill shall be verified by affidavit, and injunction bond and security given in the clerk's office; that is, the office of the clerk of the court awarding the injunction. And such, to this day, is the precise extent of the provision of the law on this subject; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 71, § 75, which is an exact transcript from the statute of 1792. This is the only clause requiring or prescribing security in county court injunctions. There is no section of the law, requiring such security to be given in injunctions awarded by a county court to the judgment of the superior courts; nor is the case comprehended by any clause of this or any other statute whatsoever; a pregnant proof, I conceive, that such power to injoin the judgment of a superior court, was not only never designed to be conferred, but is to be regarded as excluded, because no provision has been made for the manner in which it shall be exercised.

The legislative understanding of this matter is further evinced by the 62nd section of the county court law, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 71, which provides, that "Whenever an injunction shall be obtained in any county or corporation court, to stay proceedings at law upon a judgment of such court," process may issue against such defendant or defendants as do not reside within the said county; whereas no provision is made for the case of an injunction to the judgment of a circuit court.

The opinion of the judges of the general court also, in the case of Hite v. Fitz Randolph, although not authoritative, is certainly entitled to the highest respect. And, lastly, the very general impression of the profession against the existence of this power in the county court, if it affords no guide for our decision, furnishes at least an assurance, that the practice has been too rare and too circumscribed, to render it dangerous or inconvenient to interfere with it. The possession of chancery powers by the circuit courts, under the present system of our courts, will render the appeal to the county courts for relief against judgments of the circuit courts, less than ever necessary; and it is probable, that even if the judgment of this court did not deny the power, we should never hereafter hear of its exercise.

Judgment affirmed.

Alcock v. Hill.

December, 1833.

Forthcoming Bonds*—Suspension of Execution—Rights of Surety.—A creditor suspends execution on a forthcoming bond for several years, but he does so without consideration, and he nowise binds himself to suspend execution for any definite time; the principal and all the sureties but one become insolvent; and then the creditor sues out execution against the solvent surety: Held, the surety is not entitled to relief in equity.

Principal and Surety—Discharge of Surety—Indulgence.—The principles stated, on which indul-

Forthcoming Bonds.—See generally, monographic notes on "Statutory Bonds" appended to Goolsby v. Strother, 21 Gratt. 107.

Principal and Surety—Discharge of Surety—Withdrawal of Execution against Principal.—A surety is not discharged, or exonerated to any extent, by the simple withdrawal of an execution against the principal, after it has been placed in the hands of the sheriff but before actual levy, though the principal may have had personal property on which the execution might have been levied. To this effect, the principal case was cited in Ambler v. Leach, 15 W. Va. 697; Armistead v. Ward, 2 Pat. & H. 512; Walker v. Com., 18 Gratt. 39; Humphrey v. Hitt, 6 Gratt. 510, 528, and foot-note.

In Ashby v. Smith, 9 Leigh 172, JUDGE BROCKENBROUGH expressed the view that the principal case and McKenny v. Waller, 1 Leigh 434, were rendered of doubtful authority by the opinions of JUDGES BROOKE and CABELL, in Chichester v. Mason, 7 Leigh 244. But in Humphrey v. Hitt, 6 Gratt. 510, JUDGE BALDWIN, in whose opinion the other judges concurred, said: "I am for adhering to the decisions of this court in McKenny v. Waller, 1 Leigh 434, and Alcock v. Hill, 4 Leigh 622, which have not been shaken by any subsequent adjudication; and which establish a principle that furnishes a safe and certain guide. To overrule them would give rise to much litigation; and the present case is a strong illustration of the evil."

See what is said by CABELL, J. in Chichester v. Mason, 7 Leigh 263, concerning the principal case. See also, foot-note to McKenny v. Waller, 1 Leigh 434, containing extracts in which the principal case is cited.

†Same—Same—Extension of Time.—Mere indulgence granted to the principal debtor will not release his surety. Knight v. Charter, 22 W. Va. 429, and First National Bank v. Parsons, 45 W. Va. 608, 32 S. E. Rep. 275, both citing the principal case as authority. But nothing is better settled than that a binding gence given by creditor to principal, exonerates the surety.

This was a bill in the superiour court of chancery of Frederickburg, exhibited by Pitman Hill against Abner Alcock, alleging, that Alcock having recovered a judgment in the circuit court of Stafford against James Hiffin and Richard Hill, and sued a fieri facias thereon, which was levied on their property, the plaintiff Pitman Hill and one Corbin became their sureties in a forthcoming bond for the delivery of the property at the day and place of sale; and the forthcoming bond being returned forfeited, execution was awarded thereon against the principals and sureties. That execution was sued by Alcock, and delivered to the sheriff; and if Alcock had not suspended proceedings*thereon, the debt might have been levied of the property of the principals; they being solvent at the time; but Alcock, without the consent or knowledge of the plaintiff Pitman Hill, gave written directions to the sheriff, to suspend proceedings on the execution till he should give further instructions. That Richard Hill, one of the principal debtors, had delivered a slave to one Hore, to be agreement between the creditor and the principal debtor to extend the time of payment for a definite period discharges the surety, if made without his consent. And the reason is, that such extension of time varies the contract of the surety, and therefore operated to discharge him, even though the change be for his benefit. Moreover, the surety is entitled upon paying the debt, when due, to be subrogated to the rights and remedies of the creditor; and if, by contract, the creditor has tied his hands and disabled himself from suing, so that if the surety were to pay the debt, he would not be free to sue immediately, the effect is to deprive the surety of a right to which, by virtue of the original contract he is entitled, and consequently to discharge him. To sustain this proposition, the principal case was cited in Stuart v. Lancaster, 84 Va. 774, 6 S. E. Rep. 139; Coleman v. Stone, 85 Va. 888, 7 S. E. Rep. 241; State Savings Bank v. Baker, 93 Va. 515, 25 S. E. Rep. 550; Bacon v. Bacon, 94 Va. 602, 27 S. E. Rep. 576; Knight v. Charter, 23 W. Va. 429; foot-note to Walker v. Com., 18 Gratt. 13, containing extract from Knight v. Charter, 22 W. Va. 429; foot-note to Harnsberger v. Gelger, 3 Gratt. 144; foot-note to Shannon v. McMullin, 25 Gratt. 211. See also, foot-note to Hill v. Bull, Gilm. 149.

In order for the indulgence to the principal to release the surety, it is necessary that a new day of payment be fixed. First National Bank v. Parsons, 45 W. Va. 697, 32 S. E. Rep. 275, citing the principal case as authority.

Same—Rights of Surety in Securities for Debt.—In Coffman v. Moore, 29 Gratt. 248, it is said: "It is also held that the surety, as against his principal is entitled to all the securities which the latter has given the creditor for the purpose of reimbursing him, if he has paid the creditor, and, if he has not, for the purpose of having it paid for his own protection. The surety has a right to stand in the shoes of the creditor in the enforcement of such securities; and the creditor, as to such securities in his hands and under his power, is considered as trustee for the surety, and if he is unfaithful, he not only fails in his duty as trustee, but violates the rights of the surety as against his principal, and is liable for the loss which the surety thereby sustains. These principles are firmly established by repeated decisions of this court. I need only refer to the following cases: Ward v. Johnson, 6 Munf. 6; McKenny's Ex'ors v. Waller, 1 Leigh 484; Alcock v. Hill, 4 Leigh 622; Humphrey v. Hitt, supra, in which JUDGE BALDWIN, with the unanimous concurrence of the other judges sitting, gives a clear and forcible exposition of the doctrines on this subject. Then follows Harnsberger Adm'r v. Kinney, 13 Gratt. 511; and the recent cases of Shannon v. McMullin, 25 Gratt. 211; Harrison's Ex'or & als. v. Price's Ex'or & als., Ibid. 553. The doctrines of the law, as enunciated, are so firmly settled in Virginia that we deem it unnecessary to pursue the inquiry outside of our own courts; but will proceed to inquire how far they are applicable to the case in hand."

sold, and the proceeds applied to the discharge of the debt due to Alcock, of which Alcock was informed, and afterwards offered the slave for sale himself, and might have sold him at any time, or procured the sale; and it was because Alcock had the means thus placed in his own hands or power, of obtaining satisfaction of his demand, that he directed proceedings on his execution to be suspended. That the plaintiff Pitman Hill, being also apprised of these facts, took no steps to secure indemnity against loss by reason of his suretyship. That Alcock forbore any further proceedings for many years, until all the other obligors in the forthcoming bond had become insolvent, but had lately sued out an execution, and caused it to be levied on the property of the plaintiff. Therefore, the bill prayed an injunction to inhibit Alcock from further proceedings, on his last mentioned execution, against the plaintiff.

The injunction was awarded.

Alcock, in his answer, said, that when the plaintiff Pitman Hill, became surety in the forthcoming bond, he did so, because he was told by the sheriff, and therefore expected, that indulgence could be obtained from Alcock, by the principal debtor Richard Hill, so soon as the debt should be secured by a forthcoming bond; and it was because Alcock was apprised that this assurance had been given, and was content with such security, that he directed the sheriff to suspend proceedings on the execution, which was afterwards issued by the clerk on the forthcoming bond: that his suspension of proceedings was a mere indulgence given without consideration, and he did not thereby preclude himself from proceeding whenever he should think proper, and *he would have proceeded at any time, if the sureties had required him to do so: and that, if Richard Hill did deliver a slave to Hore to be sold for the purpose of satisfying the debt, it was a transaction between Hill and Hore, to which he, Alcock, was nowise privy; he never offered the slave for sale, nor had any power to make such sale.

It appeared in proof, that when Pitman Hill joined in the forthcoming bond as surety, he was told by the sheriff, that Alcock would give Richard Hill, the principal, time to discharge the debt, provided satisfactory surety was given in the forthcoming bond; and that Alcock obtained an award of execution on the forthcoming bond; and an execution having been issued, he then directed, in general terms, that proceedings should be suspended till further instructions. It appeared also, that Richard Hill did deliver a slave to Hore, to be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of the debt due Alcock, and that this slave died in Hore's possession. But it was doubtful upon the evidence, whether the other allegations of the bill in respect to this slave, were true; namely, that he was delivered by Richard Hill to Hore, before the forthcoming bond was executed, with power to sell him, and with authority to Alcock to direct the sale, to pay the debt due him, and that this was the consideration on which Alcock gave the indulgence.

The chancellor thinking that the allegations of the bill were proved, perpetuated the injunction. And this court, upon the petition of Alcock allowed him an appeal from the decree.

The cause was argued by Stanard for the appellant, and Briggs and Leigh for the appellee. The argument turned chiefly on the controverted question of fact above stated.

CARR, J. It was admitted by the appellee's counsel, that Alcock's suspension of proceedings on his execution, would nowise impair his remedy against the surety, if that suspension was merely voluntary on his part. But they insisted, 625 *that it was in consequence of an agreement upon valuable consideration, which tied up Alcock's hands, and therefore released the surety; an agreement, namely, that one of the principal debtors should put a slave in Alcock's hands, or under his power, to be sold for the debt, and that in consideration of this the execution should be suspended; which agreement, they said, was complied with by the delivery of the slave to Hore to be sold by him for the purpose, or to be sold when Alcock should so require. If this case had been made out by the proofs, the counsel would have had pretty strong grounds to stand on. But to my mind, the evidence proves no such agreement. On the contrary, I think the evidence proves that the slave was put into Hore's hands, but never into the possession or under the power of Alcock; and that this was a transaction between Richard Hill and Hore, to which Alcock was not a party, and which, indeed, was subsequent to the indulgence given by Alcock, and was nowise the consideration on which Alcock gave the indulgence. The circumstances detailed in the evidence, instead of disproving, corroborate Alcock's answer. This case, therefore, belongs to that class of cases, in which it has been held, that a voluntary indulgence given by a creditor to the principal debtor, does not impair the creditor's remedy against the surety. The case of M'Kenny v. Waller, 1 Leigh 434, is in point for the appellant. The decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

CABELL and BROOKE, J., concurred.

TUCKER, P. The direction given by Alcock to the sheriff, to suspend proceedings on his execution, against the principal, till further directed, was not of itself sufficient to discharge the surety. If, indeed, a creditor engages, for a good consideration, to give indulgence, so as to tie up his hands from proceeding at any moment he may be required by the surety to do so, the surety is absolved, unless such 626 *indulgence is given with his assent.

The constituents of this principle, are, 1. a consideration; for without it, a promise to indulge is not binding: 2. a promise or agreement to indulge; for without it, the hands of the creditor are not tied, whatever collateral security he may have received: 3. that the promise should not be altogether indefinite; for an indefinite promise of forbearance is void and nugatory, and is held not to be an adequate consideration to support even a promise, since the forbearance might be but an hour, which would be a forbearance indeed, but of no advantage to the debtor: and 4. that the surety should not have assented to the indulgence given.

Trying this case upon these principles, I think it very clear, that the surety was not absolved. For, as to the transaction at the time of the execution on the forthcoming bond, I think the evidence proves, that the probable motive of the appellee for joining in it as a surety, was the expectation of getting that indulgence for his friend, which the sheriff assured him might be obtained from Alcock, upon the debt being secured by a forthcoming bond. To this indulgence then,—if, indeed, the promise of it, thus unauthorized, by the sheriff, and the indefinite character of it, could bind Alcock at all,—the surety himself assented. It was the consideration upon which he entered into the bond. Surely, he cannot complain that that has been done which was promised by the sheriff on Alcock's behalf, and was the operative motive with himself for joining in the bond.

With regard to the transaction respecting the slave put into the possession of Hore: this, it is alleged, was a consideration for the indulgence, and sufficient to bind Alcock. Admitting the facts as they are contended for, although here was a consideration, yet there was no promise, unless we resort to the original promise at the time the bond was given. Now the fact, that the principal placed collateral security in Alcock's hands, which has been lost without his default (as, in this case, by the death of the pledge), is not sufficient to discharge the surety, unless accompanied 627 by a promise of *specified forbearance.

No such promise is proved, or even charged.

We must go back then to the promise at the time the bond was given, or there is no promise in the case. And if we do, we can see in the indulgence given, until Hore could make such sale of the property as would be just to all parties concerned, nothing but a fair, bona fide, and honorable compliance with the engagement made by the sheriff and ratified by Alcock, that he would give Richard Hill time to discharge the debt, provided a forthcoming bond was given with satisfactory surety; upon the faith of which promise, as I conceive, the appellee did become a surety. He cannot complain of a compliance with it, and therefore ought not to have sought this injunction.

Decree reversed, and bill dismissed.

Foley v. McKeown.

December, 1833.

Specific Execution—Sale in Gross—Deficiency—Abatement.—A house and lot in town is advertised for sale at auction, and the lot described as containing nearly two acres: the auctioneer at the sale, states that there is nearly two acres, but points to the enclosure of the lot as containing the land he proposes to sell; and it appears to have been a sale in gross: the lot, in fact, contains only one acre and twelve poles: upon a bill for specific execution, by vendor against vendee, HELD, specific execution rightly decreed; and the purchaser is not entitled to any abatement in the price for such deficiency.

Sarah M'Keown exhibited her bill against Patrick Foley, in the superior court of chancery of Richmond, alleging that in March 1828, she had advertised and offered for sale, at public auction, a house and lot in the town of Petersburg; that Foley purchased the property at the price of 1421 dollars, payable in instalments; and that a memorandum in writing of the contract and terms of sale, was prepared by 628 the "auctioneer, and signed by Foley, but that he now refused to comply with the contract; and praying a decree for specific execution.

Foley answered, that in the advertisement of the property for sale published by the plaintiff, it was described as a lot of land containing "nearly two acres;" that the property was sold by the description contained in the advertisement, no correction or alteration thereof being made by the auctioneer at the time of sale, except that he pointed out the enclosure of the lot, to the persons present; that he, Foley, believing that the lot contained "nearly two acres," as mentioned in the advertisement, and as the auctioneer stated at the sale, without adding the words "more or less," purchased it on the terms mentioned in the bill, and without suspecting any deficiency in quantity, signed the memorandum prepared by the auctioneer; but that it was shortly afterwards ascertained by survey, that the lot, instead of being nearly two acres, was only one acre and twelve poles; that the value of real property in towns, depends materially on the quantity of ground; that his chief object in making the purchase, was the ground, and he would not have given near so much, if he had not been misled as to the quantity; and that, therefore, he had declined to complete the purchase, and asked to be absolved altogether from the contract.

The advertisement described the property, as the lot lately occupied by Alex. M'Keown deceased, situated at the junction of Market street and Halifax road, "containing nearly two acres, and having on it a good dwelling house and the usual out houses." The memorandum of the contract signed by Foley, stated that he had purchased, at auction, for the sum of 1421 dollars, "the house and lot lately occupied by A. M'K. deceased," on a credit &c. without any mention of the quantity.

The auctioneer deposed, that after he had prepared the advertisement of the sale by direction of the plaintiff, he understood that part of the lot as originally held by Alex. M'Keown deceased, had been 629 sold by him in his "lifetime, and being therefore uncertain as to the true quantity, he declared, publicly, at the commencement of the sale, that the lot was to be sold as so much, more or less, and no particular quantity was to be warranted; that the boundaries of the lot, namely, the enclosure thereof, was repeatedly pointed out to the persons present as containing the ground offered for sale; that when Foley presented himself as a bidder, he had a private conversation with him, and made the same declaration to Foley, which he had made publicly, at the commencement of the sale, pointing out to him at the same time the boundaries of the lot. And another witness, who was at the sale, deposed, that the auctioneer proclaimed, that the quantity of ground was about, or was reckoned at, two acres, but that he would not warrant that quantity, and then pointed to the enclosure as containing the ground he was selling. But eight persons present at the sale, deposed, that they heard no such public declaration as that which the auctioneer said he made at the commencement of the sale; and that all they heard him say, was, in the language of the advertisement, that the lot "contained nearly two acres;" but he pointed out the boundaries, namely, the enclosure, as including the property he was going to sell. One person who was a bidder at the sale said, that if he had purchased the lot, he would have thought himself entitled, under the description of the lot as containing "nearly two acres," to more than an acre and a half. However, there was very clear proof, that the sale was a sale in gross, of the ground contained within the enclosure, and not a sale by the quantity; and that this was intended by the vendor and the auctioneer, and understood by the persons present at the sale. It was proved that the lot contained only one acre and twelve poles.

The chancellor decreed specific execution of the contract. And upon the petition of Foley to this court, an appeal was allowed him from the decree.

630 *The cause was argued here, by Spooner for the appellant, and by Wyndham Robertson for the appellee, upon two points: 1. Whether, seeing that the lot was described in the printed advertisement, and by the auctioneer at the sale, as containing nearly two acres, and that before the sale, there had occurred reason to doubt whether the quantity was not exaggerated in the advertisement, and that the lot was in fact only one acre and twelve poles,—the court of chancery ought, under such circumstances, to have decreed specific performance of the contract? And 2. Whether the purchaser ought not, at least, to have been allowed an abatement, from the price in proportion to the deficiency?

TUCKER, P. I throw out of the case, the evidence of the auctioneer, that he proclaimed that a part of the lot had been sold by the former owner in his lifetime, and that it was sold only for so much, more or less, without warranty of quantity. Where there has been a public advertisement of the terms of a sale at auction, the bidders must be presumed to have looked to those terms, if the contrary be not proved; unless it is proved, that the buyer did know of a change or variation in the terms. Whether, in any case, this knowledge can be brought home to a party who denies it, by proof that other persons heard the announcement of the change, it is not necessary to decide in this case. It would be hard to presume, that the defendant must have heard what he disclaims having heard, when eight or nine persons attending at the same time and place, equally depose that they did not hear it. But, independent of that fact, I take the purchase to have been a purchase in gross. It was not a purchase by the quantity of ground contained in the lot. It was a purchase of the lot of ground, such as it was, whether it was more or less than two acres. It was advertised as containing "nearly two acres;" an indefinite expression, which excludes all idea of any accurate graduation of the price to the actual quantity of ground. It is impossible to fix upon any precise point, to which the representation can 631 *be supposed to have referred. Can it be affirmed, that an acre and a half came within the description of "nearly two acres?" One bidder thought it would. The party not having warranted or stated any particular quantity,—the lot being small, the enclosure pointed out, and the whole lying under the eye of the purchaser, I cannot doubt that it was a purchase in gross, and that the purchaser should be compelled to complete the contract.

The other judges concurring, decree affirmed.

Marriage Settlement*—Construction—Liability for Beneficiary's Debts.—By deed of marriage settlement, slaves of the feme are conveyed to a trustee, in trust to permit the husband to take the profits during the joint lives of himself and his wife; remainder, if the husband should first die, to the wife; and if she should first die, to such persons as she should appoint; with an express declaration, that the property should not be subject to the husband's debts: Held, the husband's interest in the profits during the joint lives of himself and his wife, is subject to his debts; and provision should be made for satisfaction of a creditor, by hiring the slaves out, or otherwise, as most convenient.

By deed of marriage settlement between Edward Lenieve and Jane M'Cann, executed before the marriage, certain slaves, the property of the wife, were conveyed to Richard M'Cann, upon trust, from and after the intended marriage, to permit Edward, the husband, during the joint lives of himself and Jane his wife, to take and enjoy all the profits of the said slaves to his own use and benefit; and from and after the decease of the husband if he should first die, to transfer and convey the whole of the slaves to the wife; and from and after the decease of the wife, if she should first die, then to such person or persons, in such manner and proportions, as she should appoint. The wife relinquished all 632 right of dower of the real estate of the husband, *in case she should survive him, and all right to any portion of his personal estate, and to administration thereof. And it was expressly declared to be the intent of the deed, and agreed by and between the parties, that the slaves thereby settled should not be at the disposal, or subject to the control, debts, forfeitures or engagements, of the husband.

After the marriage, the appellant Butler, having recovered a judgment against Edward Lenieve, the husband, sued out a fieri facias thereon, which was levied on one of the slaves settled by the deed.

Whereupon, M'Cann, the trustee, and Lenieve and wife, exhibited a bill against him in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, setting forth the deed of marriage settlement; insisting, that the slaves thereby settled, were nowise subject to the debts of Lenieve, the husband, and praying an injunction to inhibit the sale of the slave taken on Butler's execution. An injunction was awarded. Butler, in his answer, insisted that Lenieve, the husband, was entitled to an interest in the property, namely, to all the profits thereof during the joint lives of himself and wife, which was subject to execution for his debts. The chancellor held, that the property, under the provisions of the settlement, was not liable for the debts of the husband; and therefore, perpetuated the injunction. From this decree, Butler appealed to this court.

Spoooner, for the appellant.

No counsel for the appellees.

PER CURIAM. The appellee Edward Lenieve, the husband, had an equitable interest in the slave, on which the appellant's execution was levied, which is liable for his debts; and the decree is erroneous in perpetuating the injunction unconditionally, instead of providing for subjecting that equitable interest of Lenieve, to the charge of the debt due the appellant. Therefore, it is to be reversed, and the cause remanded to the court of chancery, with instructions *to provide for subjecting Lenieve's interest in the slave to the payment of the debt due the appellant, by hiring the slave out, or otherwise, as shall be found most convenient.

Decree reversed, and cause remanded &c.

Garnett v. Jones.

December, 1833.

Execution—Injunction by Principal—Liability of Surety for Damages Sustained Thereby.—Execution is awarded on a forthcoming bond against the principal and the surety therein bound; the principal alone obtains an injunction to stay proceedings at law, which injunction is dissolved: Held, the surety is not liable for the damages incurred by the principal for retarding the execution by an injunction; and if an execution issue against the surety as well as principal for such damages, it ought, on the surety's motion, to be quashed. The execution should be so moulded, as to exempt the surety from the damages, and to make the principal who incurred them alone liable therefor.

The appellee Jones, having recovered a judgment against one Thompson, in the county court of Buckingham, sued out a fieri facias thereon in August 1820, on which execution there was the following indorsement for the direction of the sheriff, viz. "Credit 58 dollars paid the 27th May 1818—Credit John Johns's half of the within, 25th May 1819." It appeared by the sheriff's return on this execution, that he gave credit for the 58 dollars, and omitting to give credit for Johns's half of the debt, levied the execution on Thompson's property for the balance; whereupon Thompson gave a forthcoming bond for the delivery of the property at the time and place appointed for the sale thereof, in which the appellant Garnett was bound as his surety. The amount of the debt stated in the forthcoming bond, exceeded the debt really due, to the extent of the credit indorsed on the execution for John Johns's half, which the sheriff had overlooked or disregarded. The bond having been returned forfeited, the county court, at December term 1820, 634 on the *motion of Jones, and upon due notice to Thompson and Garnett (who, however, made no defence), awarded execution thereon against them both; and Jones forthwith sued out a fieri facias, on which the sheriff made return, in March 1821, that "proceedings were stopt by injunction." What were the grounds on which this injunction had been obtained, nowise appeared in this record.

But, in March 1830, Jones sued out another fieri facias on the forthcoming bond against Thompson and Garnett, returnable in June following, for the debt therein mentioned, with interest and costs, and also "for 490 dollars to which the said Jones is entitled for his damages, by reason of the said Thompson retarding the execution of the judgment by injunction;" whence it appeared, that it was Thompson alone, not Thompson and Garnett, who had obtained the injunction; and it appeared, from the time for which the damages were computed, that the injunction had been pending for more than nine years.

At April term 1830, Garnett moved the county court to quash the forthcoming bond and a fieri facias thereon of March 1830; and the court, on a hearing of the parties, quashed the forthcoming bond as well as the execution; quashing the forthcoming bond, on the ground, no doubt, that the sheriff had omitted to give credit on the original execution, "for John Johns's half of the debt," according to the direction indorsed thereon, and thus had taken the forthcoming bond for double the amount of the debt really due.

Upon a supersedeas to this order, awarded on the petition of Jones, the circuit court of Buckingham reversed the order, and adjudged that Garnett's motion to quash the forthcoming bond and the execution thereon of March 1830, should be overruled. And then Garnett appealed to this court.

Michie, for the appellant.

Claiborne, for the appellee.

635 *CABELL, J., delivered the resolution of the court. The county court unquestionably erred in quashing the forthcoming bond, after it had, at a previous term, entered a judgment awarding an execution thereon. That judgment, so far as the county court was concerned, finally settled all questions as to the regularity of the bond. If the judgment was erroneous, it could only have been corrected by an appellate court. But, though the judgment and the bond on which it was founded, must be thus regarded as correct, yet it was still competent to the county court, to quash an execution irregularly sued out thereon. And there was manifest irregularity and injustice in the execution of March 1830.

Thompson alone had retarded the execution on the bond, by the injunction; and the damages resulting from that measure, should have fallen on him only. The execution should, therefore, have been so moulded as to subject Garnett to the payment of nothing more than the debt, interest and costs, due by the forthcoming bond. This was not done; it went against him for the damages also. The judgment of the circuit court overruling the motion to quash the execution, should, therefore, be reversed. But as the county court quashed the forthcoming bond, as well as the execution, that judgment must also be reversed, and judgment should be entered quashing the execution only.

Goode v. Love's Adm'rs.

December, 1833.

New Trial—When Not Granted.*—A new trial ought never to be granted, where it appears that the party asking it, has had a fair trial on the real merits of the case, and that justice has been done.

Debt, in the circuit superior court of Mecklenburg, brought in March 1832, by Love's administrators against Goode, on a bond of Goode to Bruce & Sydnor, 636 assigned *to Love in his lifetime.

Goode pleaded, 1. payment; and 2. that, in a previous action of assumpsit, in the former circuit court of Mecklenburg, brought in January 1829, by Goode against Love's administrators, the debt due by the bond on which this action was brought, had been set off by them, and that the same was allowed and discounted from Goode's just demand in that action. And on these pleas, issues were made up.

At the trial, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, and judgment was entered for them accordingly. But the next day, the counsel for Goode, he being absent, moved the court to set aside the judgment and verdict, and to direct a new trial on two grounds, 1. that he had been improperly ruled into trial, in the absence of his witnesses, and 2. that the court had misdirected the jury. The court overruled the motion; and Goode's counsel filed exceptions to the opinion.

1. It appeared from the bill of exceptions, that when the cause was called for trial the day before, Goode being absent, his counsel had asked a continuance, alleging that there were several witnesses for the defendant whom he believed to be material, who were then absent, though they had been in attendance during every former day of the term, and he imputed their absence then, to the weather which was very rainy; but the court refused the continuance, saying, that the defence of the defendant could be proved by the officers of the court, or the counsel in attendance.

2. It appeared, that the court had instructed the jury at the trial, that the only question it had to decide, was, whether the jury who tried the action of assumpsit of Goode against Love's administrators, had allowed the bond on which this action was brought, as a set off against Goode's demand in that action. The record of Goode's action against Love's administrators, was exhibited; which shewed, that the only plea pleaded by Love's administrators in that action, was the plea of the statute of limitations; though it also appeared, that in September 1829, the bond on which this action was brought, was by leave of court, filed as a set off in that. Goode's counsel alleged, that the court had, in its direction to the jury, intirely overlooked the issue on the plea of payment, to which the testimony of the absent witnesses applied; and he offered an affidavit, that he had been misled by what had fallen from the court, in overruling the motion for a continuance, and supposed that the defendant would not be allowed to adduce evidence on the plea of payment; and that in consequence of this, he had forborne to call a witness, actually in attendance at the trial, whose evidence related to the plea of payment. But the court overruled the motion for the new trial, because there was no evidence of the materiality of the witnesses who were said to have been absent, or of the witness said to have been in attendance, and because both the counsel for the plaintiff and for the defendant, had stated, in their opening to the jury, that the defence rested on the second plea.

Upon the petition of Goode, a supersedeas to the judgment was allowed by a judge of this court.

The cause was argued here by the attorney general for the plaintiff in error, and Leigh for the defendant, upon the following objections taken by the former: 1. That the court had erred in refusing the continuance asked on the ground of the absence of witnesses, whom Goode's counsel believed to be material, Goode himself not being present to make affidavit of their materiality, and his absence being fairly imputable to the same cause, which probably prevented the witnesses from attending, namely, the inclemency of the weather. 2. That the ground on which the court refused the continuance, shewed, that it overlooked the issue on the plea of payment, and supposed the only issue to be that made up on the second plea; which was well calculated to mislead Goode's counsel, as he was ready to make affidavit that he was misled, into a belief, that no evidence was to be received on the plea of payment; and this also explained why he had rested the defence at the trial, on the second plea. 3. That the court misdirected the jury, in telling them that the only question to be decided, was that presented by the issue on the second plea. And that, upon the whole, it was apparent, that the court, the counsel, and the jury had wholly overlooked the issue on the plea of payment.

TUCKER, P. The court having overruled the motion for a continuance saying, "that the defendant's defence could be proved by the officers of the court or by the counsel in attendance," we are left to infer, from the facts stated in the exception, that both Goode and his witnesses were prevented from attending by the inclemency of the weather. And if there was nothing more in the case, I should think the continuance ought to have been granted: for, if the weather was so inclement as to excuse the absence both of party and witnesses, no affidavit of materiality from the party, could reasonably have been expected.

But it appears, that the real defence was upon the second plea. It is impossible that Goode could have designed to defend himself, both by proving that the debt had been discounted in the former suit, and that he had also paid it in some other manner. And it is expressly stated in the bill of exceptions that his counsel rested his defence upon the second plea only. Now, as to this second plea, he could not have been permitted to introduce any oral testimony, to prove that the bond had been set off by the jury in Goode's action against Love's administrators: because in the record of that case, it appears the parties went to trial upon one plea only, and that was the plea of the statute of limitations. Under the plea of the statute of limitations, the set off in question could never have been introduced; and had testimony been offered to prove that it had been, I think that testimony should have been rejected. Hence it is clear, that Goode sustained no injury in being ruled into trial upon his second plea.

639 *As to the plea of payment, the bill of exceptions shews, that Goode rested his defence upon the other plea; and, therefore, we cannot suppose that the absent witnesses were necessary to the support of this. Indeed, it is clear, that he has had a fair trial of the very matter on which he relied as protecting him from the plaintiff's claim; and as this is a motion for a new trial, it ought not to be granted since it seems that justice has been done.

If, indeed, we were permitted to draw inferences as to the fact of payment from the record, I should say it is clear Goode has not paid the debt. As late as September 1829, it was filed as a set off in his suit against Love's administrators. This suit is brought against him in March 1832. He pleads here, that the bond had been set off and discounted in the former suit. Can we believe, that, after the bond had been, as he supposed at least, discounted in the former suit, he would have paid it? I think not, and therefore I feel assured, that no injustice has been done him by the verdict. That being so, a new trial ought not to be granted.

The judgment is to be affirmed.

The Commonwealth v. Sherrard.

December, 1832.

Justice of Peace*—Disqualification—Incompatible Office—Effect of Resignation Thereof.†—By the statute of 1821-2, ch. 26, if a justice of the peace is appointed to and accepts an office under the government of the U. States or any other incompatible office, he thereby vacates his office of justice of the peace; his resignation of the incompatible office will not restore him to the office of justice of peace; nor can he ever lawfully exercise this office, without a new commission.

Case adjourned from the circuit superiour court of Hampshire. At October term 1831, a rule was made upon Sherrard, to shew a cause why an information in the nature of quo warranto, should not be filed 644 against him for exercising *the office of justice of the peace of the county of Hampshire, without any legal warrant or authority. The rule was enlarged till October term 1832, when Sherrard appearing to shew cause, the following facts were agreed:

That Sherrard was duly appointed and commissioned a justice of the peace for the county of Hampshire, in October 1818, and was duly qualified, by taking the oaths required by law, in March 1819: that he had, thenceforth, continued to act as justice of the peace, till the present time: that, in October 1828, he was duly appointed by the government of the U. States, assistant post master at Sherrard's store in Hampshire, and took the oaths prescribed by the laws of the U. States for assistant post masters; and his appointment of assistant post master was placed on file at the general post office at Washington: and that he resigned his office of assistant post master, before the rule upon him to shew cause why the information should not be filed, was made: Whereupon, the circuit superiour court, with the defendant's consent, adjourned the following questions to this court: Whether, upon the facts agreed, leave ought to be granted to file the information? and whether the defendant's acceptance of the office of assistant post master had, under the circumstances of the case, incapacitated him from holding the office of justice of the peace?

PER CURIAM. The second section of the statute of the 26th February 1822, concerning the disqualifications of justices of the peace,* seems to remove all difficulty on this subject. That statute provides, "that the acceptance of any office under the government of the U. States, or of deputy sheriff in any county within the commonwealth, or of any other office incompatible with that of justice of the peace, agreeably to the existing laws, except the office of high sheriff of any county, shall in like manner vacate the commission of the justice so accepting such office, and he 645 *shall thereafter be disqualified to act as a justice of the peace, unless under the authority of a new commission." There can be no question, that an assistant post master holds an office under the government of the U. States; and it is of no consequence, that the defendant had resigned that office, before this prosecution was commenced; for by the acceptance of it, his commission as a justice was absolutely vacated, and he became forever disqualified to act as such, unless under the authority of a new commission.

Therefore, this court is unanimously of opinion, that upon the facts agreed and stated in the record, leave should be granted to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto against the defendant, to remove him from his office of justice of the peace: and that the acceptance of the office of assistant post master by him, under the circumstances, did incapacitate him from holding the office of justice of the peace, unless under the authority of a new commission.

of a circuit superior court, a grand jury is impaneled and sworn, and proceeds in discharge of its duties; but next day, it is discovered that one of the grand jurors wants legal qualification: upon which the court discharges him, and orders another to be sworn in his place: HELD, this was regular, and the grand jury duly constituted.

Case adjourned from the circuit superior court of Rockbridge. At September 1831, a grand jury of sixteen persons was impaneled and charged; and having made one presentment, were adjourned to the next day, when all the jurors appeared; but it being discovered that one of them was not a freeholder, he was discharged and another juror sworn in his place. The grand jury thus constituted, at a *subsequent day of the term, found an indictment against Burton for unlawful gaming. Burton offered a plea in abatement, setting forth in substance, the facts above stated, and alleging that the grand jury, which found that indictment, was not duly constituted according to law. The attorney for the commonwealth objected to the filing of the plea. And the court, with the assent of the defendant, adjourned to this court, the question, whether the plea ought to be received or rejected?

SCOTT, J., delivered the resolution of the court. The statute which charged the circuit superior court with the duty of arraigning and trying offenders, invested it with all the common law powers incident to a court of criminal jurisdiction, and necessary to the discharge of the duty enjoined upon it. There are many offences which can only be tried upon indictments found by a grand jury. It is, moreover, the great instrument for inquiring into infractions of the penal laws, and bringing offenders to trial. The power, then, to procure the attendance of a grand jury, results from the criminal jurisdiction of the court; and had there been no statutory provision procuring the attendance of grand juries, the courts of criminal jurisdiction in this country, would have been invested with the common law powers of the courts of oyer and terminer and jail delivery in England. We are told by lord Hale, that upon the summons of any sessions of the peace, and in cases of commissions of oyer and terminer and jail delivery, "there goes out a precept either in the name of the king, or of two or more justices of the peace directed to the sheriff," commanding him to summon a grand jury. "Upon this precept the sheriff is to summon twenty-four or more out of the whole county, namely a considerable number out of every hundred, out of which the grand inquest at the sessions of the peace, oyer and terminer or jail delivery, are taken and sworn, ad inquirendum pro domino rege et corpore comitatus."—"The grand inquest returned the first day of the sessions and 647 *sworn, commonly serves the whole sessions of the peace, oyer and terminer and jail delivery; yet the court may command another grand inquest to be returned and sworn, which is done ordinarily upon two occasions. 1. If before the end of the sessions, the grand jury having brought in all their bills, are discharged by the court, and after that discharge, either some new felony or other misdemeanour is committed, and the party taken and brought into jail; or if after the discharge of the grand inquest, some offender be taken and brought in during the sessions. 2. The second ordinary instance of a new grand jury returned, is upon the statute 3 Hen. 7, ch. 1, namely a grand inquest impaneled to inquire into the concealment of another grand inquest &c." 2 Hal. P. C. 154, 156.

In the absence then of all statutory provision on the subject, the courts of criminal jurisdiction in Virginia, might have caused grand juries to be summoned and impaneled whenever and as often as the business before them required. Has that power been taken away by statute?

We have seen, that by the provisions of the common law, grand juries were summoned previous to the meeting of the court, by precept in the name of the king or two or more justices of the peace. This was anterior to and independent of any action of the court. The object was to have a grand jury in attendance at the commencement of the term, so that there should be no delay. Over and above this provision, the court had the power, from time to time, to order grand juries to be summoned, as occasion might require. Our statute, which makes it the duty of the sheriff, ex officio, to summon a grand jury to attend on the first day of the term, is a substitute for the precept above mentioned, and could not have been intended to take from the court, the highly convenient power which it otherwise would have possessed.

If, then, the court had the power to discharge an intire jury of qualified persons, and summon another, it certainly 648 *could discharge one unqualified member, and substitute another qualified juror in his place.

Again; in this case, the grand jury as first impaneled, was not legally constituted. If it had found the indictment, the want of qualification in the member subsequently withdrawn, might and no doubt would have been pleaded in abatement; so that, if the doctrine contended for by the defendant should prevail, the swearing of a single unqualified juror would put an end to the business of the grand jury for the whole term. Such a state of things would not have existed independent of the statute; of the court, the object being to have a grand jury in attendance at the commencement of the term. The court, however, had power to have a grand jury summoned during the term, as occasion might require. Burton's Case, 4 Leigh 645. By statute in Virginia, until a comparatively recent period, the sheriff was required, ex officio, to summon a grand jury, to attend on the first day of every term prescribed by law, as a substitute for the precept above mentioned. And now the statute, Code, sec. 3976, provides that a venire facias to summon a regular grand jury shall be issued by the clerk prior to the commencement of each term at which such grand jury is required."

In Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 604, 27 S. E. Rep. 884, JUDGE BRANNON, said: "It is clear that a criminal court possesses at common law, without statute, inherent power to impanel grand juries, and I know no limit; but I know, on above authority, that it can summon new grand juries at the same term, and this inherent power carries the ability to summon new ones as often as necessity exists. Opinion in Burton's Case, 4 Leigh 648; Shinn's Case, 32 Gratt. 899." and the legislature never could have intended, by a simple direction to the sheriff to provide a grand jury at the commencement of the term, to place such a restriction on the powers of the court.

We are all of opinion that the plea ought to be rejected.

Rape—Attempt by Slave*—What Constitutes—Case at Bar.—Upon an indictment on statute of 1822-3, ch. 34, § 3. It is found, that a free negro, not intending to have carnal knowledge of a white woman by force, but intending to have such knowledge of her while she was asleep, got into bed with her, and pulled up her night garment, which waked her, using no other force: HELD, this was not an attempt to ravish, within the meaning of the statute.

Case adjourned from the circuit superiour court of Rockbridge. Fields, a free negro, was indicted in that court, upon the statute of 1822-3, ch. 34, § 3, for violently and feloniously making an assault upon, and attempting to ravish, a white woman. The jury found the following special verdict: "We find, from the evidence, that the prisoner did not intend to have carnal knowledge of the within named S. L. as alleged in the indictment, by force, but that he intended to have such carnal knowledge of her while she was *asleep; that he made the attempt to have such carnal knowledge of her when she was asleep, but used no force except such as was incident to getting to bed with her, and stripping up her night garment in which she was sleeping, and which caused her to awake. If the law be for the prisoner, upon this finding, then we find him not guilty; but if against him, then we find him guilty; and, in that case, if the offence be not punishable by death, but by confinement in the public jail and penitentiary house, we ascertain the term of his imprisonment therein, to be six years." Whereupon, the court, with the assent of the prisoner, adjourned to this court, the question, what judgment ought to be given on the special verdict?

PER CURIAM. This court is of opinion, that upon the special verdict found in this case, judgment of acquittal ought to be rendered in favor of the prisoner.

guilty, assessing several fines on each; an attorney's fee is not to be taxed against each, but only one attorney's fee against all the defendants.

Case adjourned from the circuit superiour court of Smyth. Upon an indictment for an assault and battery, against George, Archibald, Henry and Mahlon Sprinkle, and three other persons, the defendants pleaded, severally, not guilty. The jury found the four Sprinkles guilty, and assessed a fine, severally, on each of them; and they found the other three defendants not guilty. The court gave judgment against each of the defendants found guilty, for the fine assessed on him by the verdict, and judgment against all four of them, for the costs of the prosecution. They then moved the court to direct the clerk to tax but one fee for the attorney for the commonwealth. The court certified, that the evidence in the case, was the same against each defendant, shewing the different agency and guilt of each, in the same offence; and, with the consent of the defendants, adjourned the question of practice to this court, Whether a fee of ten dollars for the attorney for the commonwealth, ought to be *taxed against each of the four defendants found guilty, or only one fee of ten dollars against all four of them?

BROCKENBROUGH, J. This court is unanimously of opinion, that, in this case, an attorney's fee of ten dollars ought not to be taxed against each of the four defendants, and that one fee of ten dollars should be taxed against all of them. 1 Rev. Criminal Law—Free Negroes—By What Court and in What Manner Tried.—Upon the construction of the statute of 1831-2, ch. 22, § 11, free negroes and mulattoes are to be tried by the county courts of oyer and terminer, in the same manner in which slaves are tried, in all cases of felony, except homicide and such crimes as, if committed by free negroes or mulattoes, were, by the laws existing before this statute, punishable with death; and for homicide and such crimes as, if committed by free negroes or mulattoes, were so punishable with death, they are still to be tried by jury in the circuit superiour courts.

Same—Same—Same—Effect of Statute.—In cases of felonies committed by free negroes or mulattoes, other than homicide and capital crimes, the statute changes the manner of trial and the tribunal for the trial, but not the punishment which previous laws inflicted on free negroes or mulattoes for such crimes; and the county court of oyer and terminer convicting such a person of such a crime, may and must sentence the convict to imprisonment in the penitentiary, if that be the punishment prescribed by previous laws.

Burglary—Indictment—Allegation of Time.*—An indictment charging that goods were feloniously and burglariously taken from a dwelling house, without charging that this was done in the night time, is not a good indictment for burglary, but is only an indictment for a larceny.

These four cases depended upon the construction of the 11th section of the statute of the 15th March 1832, Sess. Acts of 1831-2, ch. 22, § 11; Supp. to Rev. Code, ch. 187, p. 248, whereby it is provided, that "free negroes and mulattoes shall hereafter be prosecuted, tried, convicted and punished, for any felony, by justices of oyer and terminer, in the same manner as slaves are now prosecuted, tried, convicted and punished; and any court summoned or adjourned for such trial, shall have and exercise all the powers and incidents of a court summoned or adjourned for the trial of a slave, except that in cases of homicide and in cases where the punishment shall be death, the mode of trial shall remain as heretofore."

653 *I. Weldon's case was adjourned to this court, from the circuit superiour court of Shenandoah. The prisoner was indicted in that court, for horse stealing; and being tried, and found guilty by the verdict of the jury, he made a motion in arrest of judgment, 1. because, as it appeared by the indictment that he was a free negro, the circuit superiour court had no jurisdiction to try him for this crime; and 2. because, by the statute of the 15th March 1832, free negroes and mulattoes could, thenceforth, only be prosecuted, tried, convicted and punished, for any felony, by justices of oyer and terminer, in the same manner that slaves are prosecuted, tried, convicted and punished. Whereupon, the court, with the prisoner's consent, adjourned to this court, the question, What judgment should be rendered?

The question was argued by the attorney general for the commonwealth, and by Samuels for the prisoner.

BROCKENBROUGH, J., delivered the opinion of the court. We have rarely met with any law more difficult to understand, and which has given rise to a greater diversity of opinion, than the short section on which this case, and with it the life of the prisoner, depends. The counsel who have argued it, have each given a very lucid view of his own construction; and the court, on the most serious consideration, have come to a conclusion different from that of either of them.

What is the meaning of the first clause of the section in question? Free negroes and mulattoes "shall be punished in the same manner as slaves." Does it mean, that the free negro shall be punished to the same extent—to the same degree—that the slave is punished? Heretofore, by former laws, plainly written, the slave guilty of horse stealing, was punished with death without benefit of clergy: the free negro, by imprisonment in the public jail and penitentiary house. The same difference exists as to burglary, robbery, forgery, and a long list of crimes. We do not think it con-

654 sistent *with the settled rules of interpretation applicable to penal statutes, and, particularly, to statutes on the subjects of capital felonies, to construe this statute as abolishing former laws, and substituting death as the punishment instead of imprisonment, by the mere declaration, that the manner of punishment of the free negro shall be the same as the manner of punishment of the slave. Penal statutes must be construed strictly; and we should, in all such cases, bear in mind the precedent set in the construction of a statute of George II. by the courts in England. By that law the stealing of sheep, or other cattle, was made felony without benefit of clergy. But the general words "or other cattle" being looked upon as much too loose to create a capital offence, the statute was held to extend to nothing but the stealing of sheep. And, in this case, we are of opinion, that to understand the word manner as meaning extent or degree, would be not to construe the statute strictly, but to give it a forced construction, by which the severity of the punishment would be much increased. If the legislature intended to declare, that, in all cases of felony, the punishment of free negroes shall be the same hereafter as has been heretofore inflicted on slaves, for the same felonies, it would probably have used words appropriate to that idea. It would not have said, that the manner of punishment, but that the punishment itself, shall be the same. It might be proper to depart from the letter of a penal statute, where such a departure would be favorable to life or liberty, but never where it takes them away.

Let us, then, endeavour to understand the provisions of this statute. Heretofore, courts of oyer and terminer consisting of justices of the county and corporation courts, have had jurisdiction in case of slaves charged with crimes. They are authorized to try slaves, without the intervention of a jury, and after having found them guilty, they are required to render judgment, and pass sentence on them. But free negroes have not been heretofore tried, and punished, in that manner. They have been tried by a jury before the 655 *circuit courts, and have been sentenced by those courts. The law annexes the penalty on conviction; that is, it declares the quantum or degree of punishment attached to each criminal act, which the court after the conviction, merely pronounces. This statute of March 1832, enacts that hereafter free negroes and mulattoes shall not be tried and punished in that manner, but they shall be tried by justices of oyer and terminer, who after convicting shall proceed to punish them; that is, they shall proceed to pronounce the penalty which the law affixes to their crime. Such is the manner in which slaves have been heretofore tried, convicted and punished, and free negroes and mulattoes shall hereafter be tried, convicted and punished in the same manner; namely, by courts of oyer and terminer. This is the rule as to felonies generally, but there is an exception in the section,—“that in cases of homicide, and in cases where the punishment shall be death,” they shall not be tried in that mode or manner, but shall be tried as heretofore: that is, in the accustomed mode, by juries, before the circuit courts. It is the manner of trial and punishment, then, which is changed by this law, and not the punishment itself affixed to the crime which is changed.

The punishment prescribed by law to the crime of horse stealing, where that crime has been committed by a free negro, is imprisonment in the penitentiary house. How shall he be hereafter tried and punished for that offence? He shall not be tried by a jury in the circuit court, nor punished by that court, but he shall be tried and punished by the justices of oyer and terminer in the same manner as slaves are now tried and punished. The circuit court can have no jurisdiction to try and punish him for that offence, because death is not the punishment annexed by law to that crime. The justices of the county court, sitting as a court of oyer and terminer, are expressly invested by this statute, with the jurisdiction to try, convict and punish him.

The construction which we give to this provision, is strengthened by the language of the 10th section of the 656 *same statute; by which receivers from slaves &c. of stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, shall be adjudged guilty of larceny, and punished in the same manner, and to the same extent," as if the receiver were the thief. The legislature has here drawn the distinction between the manner, and the extent, of punishment. The inference is, that in another case, where it has changed the manner of the punishment, and said nothing about the extent of it, it did not mean to change the punishment itself.

The question has been asked, whether the county courts of oyer and terminer are empowered by this statute, to send free negroes and mulattoes to the penitentiary? It is argued, that they never before had that power, in any case, since that kind of punishment has never been inflicted on slaves; and this statute only gives to the county courts summoned for the trial of free negroes, all the powers and incidents of a court summoned for the trial of a slave: and it is contended, that as they never had the power to send a slave to the penitentiary, so now they have not the power to send a free negro to the penitentiary. We do not admit the correctness of this conclusion. The powers of the county courts of oyer and terminer, are to compel the attendance of witnesses, to hear the evidence, to hear counsel, to expound the law, to decide both on the law and fact, to decide whether the person accused before them, be guilty or not of the felony charged upon him. If they find him not guilty, they are to acquit and discharge him. If they find him guilty, they are to punish him; that is, not to act the ministerial part of inflicting punishment, but to pronounce the sentence of the law: they are to pronounce and declare the punishment, whatever it may be, which the law affixes to that crime, and to make the proper orders for carrying that sentence into execution. Does the law say, that the slave shall be hanged? The justices are to pronounce that sentence, and fix the day for the execution, and that judgment and order shall be the warrant to the sheriff for his execution. Does the law declare, that the slave shall be 657 *burnt in the hand, or receive stripes?

The justices render the judgment, and give the order for carrying the judgment into effect. The present law, after giving to the county courts of oyer and terminer, the power to try and punish free negroes and mulattoes, for any felony, declares farther, that they shall have and exercise all the powers and incidents of a court summoned for the trial of slaves. They shall have power, if they find them not guilty, to acquit; if they convict them, to pronounce the punishment, whatever it may be (except death), which the law affixes to the crime, and then to make the proper orders for carrying that sentence into execution. If the law declares, that the free negro shall be punished by stripes, or by imprisonment in the county jail, or by imprisonment in the public jail and penitentiary house, this statute authorizes them, in the one case as well as the other, to render the judgment, and make the proper order to the sheriff to inflict the stripes, to convey him to the county jail, or to convey him to the public jail and penitentiary house.

In the case before the court, the circuit superiour court of Shenandoah, had no jurisdiction to try the prisoner. We have, therefore, no hesitation in advising and directing that court to arrest the judgment, and set aside the verdict which has been rendered, and to order the prisoner to be carried before a justice of the peace for the county of Shenandoah, who may proceed with his case de novo, and deal with him according to law.

In this opinion, JUDGES PARKER, UPSHUR, MAY, LOMAX and DUNCAN concurred. JUDGES THOMPSON and BROWN dissented.

THOMPSON, J., held, that by the 11th section of the statute of March 1832, it was intended to subject free negroes, for all offences, to the same punishment as slaves, and to the same trial before county courts of oyer and terminer, in all cases, except in cases of homicide and in cases where 658 the punishment shall be death; by which he *understood, cases in which the free negro is punishable by death according to this statute of March 1832. In the excepted cases of homicide and other capital offences, the statute intended to give, and has given, the free negro, the benefit of a trial before the circuit superiour court.

The judgment of the court was entered as follows: "This court is of opinion, and doth decide, that the circuit superiour court for the county of Shenandoah had no jurisdiction to try the said Weldon for the crime of horse stealing with which he was charged; the said crime, when committed by a free negro or mulatto, not being punishable by death, but by imprisonment in the public jail and penitentiary house; and that for the said crime, he could only be tried by the justices of oyer and terminer for the said county. And the court is, therefore, of opinion, and doth decide, that the judgment in the said case shall be arrested, the verdict set aside, and the prisoner be ordered by the said court to be carried before some justice of the peace in and for the said county, to be dealt with according to law. Which is ordered to be certified &c."

II. Marks's case, adjourned from the circuit superiour court of Augusta, was twice before this court. He was a free negro, indicted and tried, in the circuit superiour court, at November term 1832. The indictment, as it appeared in the transcript of the record sent to this court on the first adjournment of the case, charged, that the prisoner, on the 2nd October 1832, did feloniously and burglariously break and enter into the dwelling house of &c. and did feloniously steal, take and carry away therefrom, sundry articles of property to the value of thirty dollars: but the indictment did not charge, that the offence was committed in the night time, or that any person was in the house at the time, and put in fear. The prisoner being found guilty by the verdict of the jury, the court doubting what judgment it could or ought to give, with the consent of the prisoner, adjourned the following questions to this court:

2. If only as to the mode of trial, what felonies are meant by the words of the exception in the statute, "in case where the punishment shall be death?" Do they mean such felonies as were punishable with death in the case of a slave, or such as were punishable with death in the case of a free negro or mulatto, according to the law as it stood before the passing of this statute?

3. Can the court render any judgment upon the verdict? and if any, what judgment?

* At December term 1832, LEIGH, J., delivered the resolution of the court: The difficult questions adjourned in this case, arise out of the exception contained in the statute of March 1832. In this court, another question has presented itself, namely, whether the circuit superiour courts have jurisdiction in any case of felony committed by a free negro or mulatto? Upon all these questions, there has been a difference of opinion among the judges; and we cannot refrain from suggesting, that many difficulties might be removed by an explanatory statute, pointing out in what courts the felonies mentioned in the exception shall be tried, the mode of trial, and the punishment. But in the present case, it is not necessary to give any opinion upon some of the questions adjourned.

Whatever doubt and difficulty there may be, as to the class of felonies mentioned in the exception contained in the section in question, there can be none as to other felonies. By the letter of the first member of the section, free negroes and mulattoes are to be prosecuted, tried, convicted and punished, in the same manner as slaves. We are of opinion, that the felony charged in the present indictment does not come within the exception; that is, that it is not a homicide or other felony punishable 660 with death, whether *committed by a slave or freeman. The offence charged is not a burglary, from which the benefit of clergy is taken away, if committed by a slave. In burglary, the offence must be committed in the night time. But this is not charged in the present case.

It is, indeed, charged that the offence was burglariously committed, but this is not sufficient. In every indictment for burglary, we hold that it must distinctly and plainly appear, that the offence was committed in the night time; which certainly does not appear here. In short, the offence charged is simply the breaking a dwelling house, no person being therein at the time and put in fear, and taking goods therefrom; from which offence we have not been able to find, that the benefit of clergy has been taken away. We are, therefore, of opinion, that the offence charged in the indictment comes not within the exception, and that the circuit superiour court of Augusta had no jurisdiction thereof.

This court is of opinion, and doth certify to the circuit superiour court, that no judgment can be rendered by that court on the verdict in this present case, as the said court had no jurisdiction. And this renders it unnecessary to answer the other questions adjourned.

But on this judgment being certified to the circuit superiour court, it was found, on examination of the original indictment, that it charged, that the prisoner, did "on the 2nd October 1832, between the hours of twelve and four in the night of that day, feloniously and burglariously, break and enter the dwelling house of &c. and certain articles of property then and there found, of the value of thirty dollars, did feloniously steal, take and carry away therefrom. Thus, the indictment charged a burglary, in the most technical form; a crime for which, before the statute of the 15th March 1832, a slave was punishable with death without benefit of clergy, and a free negro or mulatto with imprisonment in the penitentiary. Whereupon, the circuit superiour court again adjourned the case 661 to this court, for its opinions *on the same questions, on which it was first adjourned, sending to this court, now, a corrected transcript of the record.

And, at this term, BROCKENBROUGH, J., delivered the resolution of the court: That the circuit superiour court for the county of Augusta had no jurisdiction to try Marks for the crime of burglary with which he was charged; that crime, when committed by a free negro or mulatto, not being punishable by death, but by imprisonment in the public jail and penitentiary house; and that for such crime he could only be tried by the justices of oyer and terminer for the said county: and, therefore, that judgment in the case should be arrested, the verdict set aside, and the prisoner ordered by the court, to be carried before some justice of the peace in and for the said county, to be dealt with according to law.

III. Sunket's case was adjourned to this court from the circuit superiour court of Accomack. He was a free negro, indicted of grand larceny, in that court, and tried at May term 1833. The indictment charged, that he had been, once before, in 1829, indicted for the like crime of grand larceny, in the then circuit court of Accomack, tried, convicted and sentenced to be punished with stripes and six months imprisonment in the common jail of the county. It appeared, on the trial of this indictment, that the punishment to which he had been sentenced for the first offence, had been inflicted upon him. And upon this indictment for the second crime of grand larceny, he was found guilty by the verdict of the jury. Whereupon, the circuit superiour court adjourned to this court, the question, whether any, and if any, what judgment should be given in the case?

BROCKENBROUGH, J., delivered the resolution of the court: That the circuit superiour court for the county of Accomack had no jurisdiction to try the said Sunket for the offence of grand larceny with which he was charged; that offence, when committed by a free negro or mulatto, not being punishable by death, but by imprisonment in the public jail *and penitentiary, where the money, bank note, goods, chattels, or other thing stolen, is of greater value than twenty dollars; and that for such offence he could only be tried by the justices of oyer and terminer for the county: and, therefore, that the judgment in the case should be arrested, the verdict set aside, and the prisoner ordered by the court, to be carried before some justice of the peace in and for the said county, to be dealt with according to law.

IV. Thompson, a free negro, was indicted in the circuit superiour court of Frederick, for violently and feloniously making an assault upon, and attempting to ravish, a white woman; a crime, which when committed by a slave, free negro or mulatto, is made punishable by death, by the statute of 1822-3, ch. 34, § 3. He was found guilty by the jury, and the court passed sentence of death upon him.

And now, he presented a petition to this court, praying a writ of error to the judgment, upon the ground, that, by the 11th section of the statute of the 15th March 1832, he could only be tried for this crime, by the justices of oyer and terminer in the county court; that, according to that provision of the statute, he ought to have been tried by a jury, in the county court; and that the circuit superiour court had no jurisdiction of the case.

BROCKENBROUGH, J., delivered the resolution of the court: That, as the petitioner Thompson, a free negro, has been convicted of the felony of making an assault upon, and attempting to ravish, a white woman, and as that crime, when committed by a free negro or mulatto, is punishable with death, the circuit superiour court for the county of Frederick, had jurisdiction to try the petitioner, and that there is no error in the judgment.

Writ of error denied.

seems, that one who has contracted by articles under seal to sell his land, but has not yet conveyed it by deed, and therefore still holds the legal title, is a freeholder qualified to serve on a grand jury.

Case adjourned from the circuit superiour court of Frederick. At May term 1832, the grand jury presented Reynolds, for a misdemeanour. The usual rule to shew cause why an information should not be filed, having been made and served on Reynolds, he appeared at October term, and put in a plea in abatement, alleging, in substance, that the grand jury which found the presentment, was not duly constituted according to the statute in such case made and provided; for that M. Smith, one of the jurors, was not, at the time of the presentment, a freeholder, or the owner of any real estate or interest therein, save only the naked legal title of and in a certain parcel of land, which he had, previous to serving on the grand jury, bargained and sold to a certain J. Monroe, by written articles of agreement under the seals of the parties; which articles, set out in the plea, shewed, that Smith had covenanted to convey his land to Monroe, upon Monroe's performing certain covenants on his part; but the plea did not allege, that Smith had actually conveyed the land, or even that Monroe was, as yet, entitled by the articles to demand a conveyance thereof. To this plea the attorney for the commonwealth demurred generally. Whereupon, the court adjourned to this court, the question, whether Smith, under the circumstances stated in the plea, was a proper juror? But it did not appear from the record, that the case was so adjourned, with the assent of the defendant.

PER CURIAM. Although the court would be of opinion, that Smith, under the circumstances stated, was a proper juror, yet, as it does not appear that the question was adjourned to this court, with the consent of the accused, the case must be remanded to the circuit superiour court &c.

Case adjourned from the circuit superiour court for the county of Richmond. That court, at October term 1831, made a rule on Warner Lewis, sheriff of Essex, to shew cause, if any he could, why he did not detain in his custody one Abram White lately confined in the jail of Essex for petty larceny, and who was lately indicted in the circuit court of Richmond for forgery, and why he did not secure the person of White, that he might be dealt with according to law, as the sheriff was, by process from the circuit court of Richmond, and by his official duty, bound to do. This rule having been served on Lewis, he appeared to shew cause; but the matters alleged by him not being considered satisfactory, another rule was made on him, to shew cause, on the first day of the ensuing term, why an information should not be filed against him, for having disobeyed the process of the court, and violated his official duty, in discharging from his custody, the said White, then in confinement in the jail of Essex, under a sentence of the circuit court of Essex, for petty larceny, and who had been lately indicted for forgery in the circuit court of Richmond. This last rule was not made absolute; nor did it appear, that 665 the *court, in any way, gave leave to file the information; but an information was filed by the attorney for the commonwealth. In some of the counts in the information, it was charged, in substance, that White having been indicted for forgery in the circuit court of Richmond, a capias was issued against him, and delivery to Lewis the sheriff of Essex, by virtue of which Lewis arrested White, and had him in his custody, and then permitted him to escape and go at large; and, in other counts, that the capias was delivered to and served by Hill, a deputy of Lewis, and that Hill permitted the prisoner to escape. Lewis demurred generally to the information, and the attorney for the commonwealth joined in the demurrer.

The court ordered the capias, which had been issued against White upon the indictment against him for the forgery, and the return of the deputy sheriff of Essex thereupon, to be made part of the record. The capias was in the usual form: the return was in the following words—"By virtue of the within, I took the body of the within named Abram White, who is now confined in close jail in the county of Essex under sentence of the circuit court of the said county, for petty larceny, as will more fully appear by the order of the said court hereto annexed, and made part of my said return. (Signed) R. Hill, D. S. for Warner Lewis, sheriff."

And then the court, with the defendant's consent, adjourned the following questions to this court:

1. What judgment ought to be given on the demurrer?

2. Taking the whole case into consideration, and having reference, particularly, to the capias which was issued against White, and the return made thereon by the defendant's deputy, and to the proceedings in this prosecution previous to the filing of the information,—ought leave to have been given to file the information? or ought a nolle prosequi to be directed?

And 3. any other question of law arising on the proceedings.

666 *PARKER, J. In considering these questions, the court perceives, from the capias against White referred to, and the return of the deputy sheriff thereon, that this is, in fact, a criminal proceeding against a high sheriff for the negligence or misfeasance of his deputy; and that it is a prosecution in the county of Richmond for an act done in Essex. Thinking that the high sheriff is not thus liable, and that if he were, he could only be proceeded against, in the mode here adopted, in the county of Essex, where the act complained of was committed; and waiving other objections, such as the want of leave to file the information, which this demurrer might raise:

"This court is of opinion, upon the whole case, that as the offence was committed in the county of Essex, the circuit superiour court for the county of Richmond had no jurisdiction thereof in this mode of proceeding; and that, as the misconduct charged in the information, was the act of the deputy sheriff, and not of the high sheriff, the latter is not liable to be indicted therefor; and, therefore, that no information ought to have been filed against the said Lewis, and that a nolle prosequi ought to be directed to be entered by the said superiour court."

Grand Jury*—Objection—Juror Nominated Himself to Sheriff.—Upon a presentment by a grand jury for gaming, defendant tenders plea in abatement, that one of the grand jurors nominated himself to the sheriff to be put on the panel of the grand jury, and thereupon the sheriff put his name on the panel, and summoned him to serve, without alleging that this nomination of himself by the grand juror was corrupt, or that there was a false conspiracy between him and the sheriff for returning him on the panel: HELD, the plea is naught, and the court ought not to permit it to be filed.

Case adjourned from the circuit superiour court of Ohio. The defendant having been presented by the grand jury for unlawful gaming, offered a plea in abatement, stating, that H. Moore, one of the grand jury, nominated himself to the deputy sheriff, to be put on the panel of the grand jurors, and the deputy sheriff did thereupon place Moore's name on the panel, and summoned him to serve on the grand jury; and that Moore having so nominated himself, and being so summoned, was sworn, and was one of the grand jury, when the presentment was made. The attorney for the commonwealth insisted, that he ought not to be put to demur or reply to the plea, and objected to the filing of it. And, thereupon, the court, with the consent of the defendant, adjourned to this court, the following questions: 1. Whether the matters set forth in the plea could be pleaded in abatement of the presentment? and if so, 2. Whether the same were well pleaded?

BROCKENBROUGH, J. The duty of the sheriff is plainly pointed out by the statute. He is directed to summon, before the meeting of the court, twenty-four of the most discrete freeholders of the county, being citizens of the commonwealth and not having certain specified disqualifications. It is necessary for the upright administration of justice, that the whole jury system should be preserved free and uncontaminated. The law demands, that each grand juror shall make no presentment through malice, hatred or ill will; and 668 *that he should not be prevented from making presentments, by motives equally vicious. It also requires, that the sheriff whose duty it is to summon the grand jury, should discharge that duty with the sole view to the public good. It does not seem to be compatible with either of these requisitions of the law, that a corrupt nomination of himself to the sheriff, by a citizen of the commonwealth, to serve on the grand jury, should be permitted; or that a false conspiracy or corrupt agreement between the sheriff and himself for that purpose, should be tolerated. In Scarlet's case, 3 Inst. 33; 12 Rep. 98, it was charged, that he well knowing that he was not returned of the grand inquest, procured himself by false conspiracy to be sworn on the same, and it was decided that such procurement was an indictable offence, as well at common law, as under the statute; 11 Hen. 4, ch. 9. And whensoever such corrupt nomination shall be procured, we have the authority of this court, in Cherry's case, 2 Virg. Ca. 20, for saying, that an indictment or presentment, found by a grand jury so constituted, may be avoided by plea.

But, in the case now before the court, the plea which was tendered does not charge any corrupt nomination of himself by the grand juror, or any false conspiracy between himself and the sheriff, to be returned on the panel. The nomination of himself which is charged, may have been perfectly innocent, and the court is not authorized to presume the contrary. We have, therefore, no hesitation in deciding, that, in this case, the plea should be rejected.

"This court is of opinion, that it is not proper, in this case, to require the attorney for the commonwealth to demur or reply to the plea in abatement which was tendered by the defendant, and that the plea should be rejected."

July, 1833.

Criminal Law—Change of Venue—Directing Cause to Be Tried at Particular Term—Surplusage.—Indictment for felony in the circuit court of Warwick: the court for good cause sends the case to the circuit court of York, to be tried at the term of that court to be held on the 8th June 1831; the circuit court of York, doubting its competency to try the case at that term, which was a special one, continues it till the next regular term of the circuit superior court of York; and the prisoner is afterwards tried there, and convicted: Held, the circuit court of Warwick had no power to direct the case to be tried at any particular term of the circuit court of York; but the direction that the case should be tried at the June term 1831, is to be rejected as surplusage: the substance of the order is a change of the venue from Warwick to York.

Appellate Practice—Excessive Judgment—Solitary Confinement.—A circuit superior court, not advertising to the statute of 1832-3, ch. 19, § 2, sentences a convict to solitary confinement in the penitentiary for one sixth of the term of imprisonment fixed by the verdict: judgment reversed for this cause; but the general court proceeds to enter judgment, that the solitary confinement shall be one twelfth of the term, according to that statute.

Error to a judgment of the circuit superior court of York. Brooks was indicted for the murder of a slave, in the circuit superior court of Warwick, at a special term held on the 1st June 1831; and the court being satisfied, from the number of challenges to jurors, that an impartial and legally qualified jury to try the cause, could not be had in that county, ordered that it should be sent to the circuit court of York, to be held on the 8th day of the same month, where, in the opinion of the court, a fair and impartial trial could be had. The prisoner was admitted to bail. It appeared, that the term of the circuit court of York held on the 8th June, was a special term, held under the provisions of the act of the 15th March 1831, providing for the holding of the then remaining spring sessions of the circuit courts; Sess. Acts of 1830-31, ch. 10, p. 41. And the circuit court of York, doubting its competency to proceed with the trial of the prisoner at that special term, continued the cause to the regular term of the circuit superior court of law and chancery for the county, to be held in September 1831: bailing the prisoner 670 in the meantime. At that *term, the prisoner was put upon his trial, but the jury not agreeing in a verdict, were discharged; and there was another trial at April term 1832, which ended in the same way. At April term 1833, the prisoner was tried by a third jury, which found him guilty of manslaughter, and ascertained the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary to be two years. Whereupon, the prisoner made a motion in arrest of judgment, because he had been sent to the former circuit court of York, to be tried at the special term thereof held on the 8th June 1831, but the circuit court of York, at that special term, had no jurisdiction to try the cause, and the circuit superior court of York had no jurisdiction now to try the same; and that three terms of the circuit superior court of Warwick, having passed without any trial there had, he was entitled to demand his discharge from the prosecution. The court overruled the motion in arrest of judgment, and sentenced the prisoner to imprisonment in the penitentiary for two years, and to be kept in a solitary cell there, on low and coarse diet, for one sixth of the term of imprisonment.

And, now, he presented a petition to this court for a writ of error, assigning for error, the same matters which he had moved as reasons in arrest of judgment.

The attorney general for the commonwealth.

MAY, J. By the provisions of the statute, 1 Rev. Code ch. 169, § 9, p. 601, the circuit court of Warwick had the power and was bound, under the circumstances, to change the venue in this case; and it appears by the record, that York was the most convenient county in which a fair trial could be had. The venue was, therefore, properly changed to that county. But the circuit court of Warwick had not the power to require that the trial should take place at any particular term of the circuit court of York; and although that would seem from the phraseology of the order, to have 671 *been contemplated to be done, the circuit court of York, doubting its power, properly refused to try the case at the special term of the 8th June 1831. Whether it was proper to bail the prisoner at that term, and how far the recognizance was binding, it is not material here to inquire. The prisoner appeared at the fall term of the circuit superiour court of York; and as the venue had been changed to that county, the court took cognizance of the case, and proceeded to the trial.

We are of opinion, that so much of the order changing the venue as seemed to require the trial to be had at the term of the circuit court of York, to be held on the 8th June 1831, should be considered as surplusage; and it having been substantially disregarded, then and subsequently, there is no error in the proceedings in this particular.

But the judgment is erroneous in this, that the court sentenced the prisoner to be kept in a solitary cell &c. in the penitentiary for one sixth, instead of one twelfth, part of the term of imprisonment of two years ascertained by the verdict of the jury. Sess. Acts of 1832-3, ch. 19, § 2, p. 18. The judgment is, therefore, to be reversed, and judgment to be entered, that the prisoner be confined in the penitentiary for the term of two years, and kept in a solitary cell &c. for one twelfth part of the term.

The Commonwealth v. Watts.

December, 1833.

Arrest of Judgment.—Judgment cannot be arrested for any matter of fact not appearing in the record.

Rape—Attempt by Slave—Statute—Construction—“White Woman.”—A white girl under twelve years of age, and not having attained to puberty, is a white woman, within the meaning of the statute making it felony punishable with death, for a slave, free negro or mulatto, to attempt to ravish a white woman.

Arrest of Judgment.—A motion in arrest of judgment lies only to correct an error that is apparent on the face of the record. Gray's Case, 92 Va. 776, 22 S. E. Rep. 868, citing principal case as its authority. See further, monographic note on “Judgments” appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425.

Case adjourned from the circuit superiour court of Westmoreland. At October term 1833, Watts, a free negro, was indicted (upon the statute of 1822-3, ch. 34, § 3), and tried, for violently and feloniously making an assault upon, and attempting to ravish, one J. B. described in one count of the indictment, “a white woman unmarried,” and in another, “a white maid.” The jury found him guilty. Whereupon, he made a motion in arrest of judgment, because J. B. the female upon whom the attempt to commit the rape was charged in the indictment, was, at the time of the offence, under the age of twelve and above the age of ten years, and so was not a white woman, within the meaning of the statute on which the prosecution was founded. The court certified that it was proved at the trial, that J. B. was, at the 673 time of the offence committed by the prisoner, and *yet was, a white girl, of the age of eleven going on to twelve years, and had not attained to puberty; and then, with the prisoner's consent, adjourned to this court, the question presented by the prisoner's motion in arrest of judgment, and all other questions arising on the record of the proceedings, and, generally, what judgment ought to be given?

PER CURIAM. As to the motion in arrest of judgment, the fact on which it was founded, not appearing on the record, this court is of opinion, that it should be overruled.

The circuit superiour court having certified to this court the facts proved at the trial, it might, perhaps, be in the power of this court to direct a new trial, if the circumstances of the case should seem to this court to warrant it. But the court does not think there is any distinction between a violence of this kind, practised upon a female between the age of ten and twelve years, and a similar violence practised upon one above the age of twelve. Both are equally rapes. If this was not so, the chastity of women between the age of ten and twelve years would be very inadequately protected. It is most manifest, that the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 158, § 3, p. 585, punishing the deflowering of children under the age of ten years, does not apply to the case of an attempt to ravish a female of the age of J. B., that is, between eleven and twelve, at the time the offence was committed of which the prisoner has been convicted. And the statute of 1822-3, ch. 34, § 3, enacts, that “if any slave, free negro or mulatto, shall attempt to ravish a white woman, married, maid, or other,” such offender shall be adjudged guilty of felony, and suffer death &c.

This court is of opinion, that sentence of death ought to be passed upon the prisoner.

[26 Am. Dec. 340.]

Grand Jury—Oath Administered by Clerk De Facto—Effect.—Upon a presentment for gaming, defendant pleads in abatement, that the clerk de facto, who administered the oath to the grand jury that made the presentment, was not clerk de jure, at the time: HELD, the plea is naught.

Gaming—Presentment—Allegations—Public Place.—Presentment for gaming charges defendant with playing at unlawful game "at the house of R. L. in B. in the county of P. William:" HELD, the presentment is fatally defective in not charging that the house where &c. was an ordinary or a public place.

Error to a judgment of the circuit superior court of Prince William. At May term 1833, the grand jury made a presentment against Hord, "for playing at an unlawful game called faro at the house of R. Lipscomb in the town of Brentsville" in that county. The defendant pleaded two pleas in abatement: 1. that the grand jury which made the presentment, was not duly sworn, because J. Williams, who administered the oaths to the grand jurors, was not the clerk of the court, or the clerk pro tempore, he not having been duly appointed and commissioned as such, at the time of administering the oaths to the grand jurors, nor taken the oaths of office as clerk, or clerk pro tempore, then or at any other time: and 2. that M. Sinclair, was the clerk of the court at the commencement of the term at which the presentment was made, and resigned his office of clerk, during the term and before the presentment made, and the office of clerk was vacant at the time of the presentment, and so the grand jury was not legally impaneled and sworn. The attorney for the commonwealth put in a general demurrer to the pleas, in which the defendant joined. The court sustained the demurrer: and then, the defendant pleaded not guilty. The jury found him guilty; and thereupon, the court gave judgment against him for a fine of twenty dollars and the costs of the prosecution.

And now he presented a petition to this court for a writ of error, assigning as errors, 1. that no offence against the penal laws was charged in the presentment; and 2. that the "demurrer to the defendant's pleas was improperly sustained. The writ of error was allowed.

P. Harrison, for the plaintiff in error.

The attorney general, for the commonwealth.

PER CURIAM. The pleas filed on this case are insufficient; and consequently there was no error in sustaining the demurrer thereto. But the presentment is radically defective in this, that it is not charged that the playing was at an ordinary or other public place; and therefore, the judgment is erroneous, and must be reversed.

Criminal Law—Willful Trespasses—Statute—Construction.—Quære, whether the taking of any property other than such as is ejusdem generis with that specially mentioned in the statute of 1822-3, ch. 34, § 1, for punishing willful trespasses, be within the meaning of the statute?

Same—Same—Indictment—Allegations.—An indictment on that statute, must allege that the property taken away by the defendant, belonged to another person; and that the taking was "knowingly and wilfully without lawful authority," in the terms of the statute.

Same—Forcible Taking—Indictment—Sufficiency.—Indictment at common law, for taking a horse, "unlawfully and injuriously," the usual form with force and arms being also used: HELD, this does not describe the act as one that constitutes a breach of the peace.

Same—Rescuing Property from Sheriff's Baillee—Indictment—Allegation—Scienter.—Indictment at common law, charging defendant with rescuing property that had been distrained by a sheriff for public dues, from baillee to whose safe keeping the sheriff had committed it, without charging that the defendant knew in what right the baillee held it: HELD, indictment defective for not averring that the defendant had such knowledge.

Same—Same—Same—Same—Jeofails.—And this defect is not cured by verdict, by the statute of jeofails in criminal cases, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 44.

Case adjourned from the circuit superior court of Harrison. Israel was indicted in that court, at May term 1833, for a misdemeanor. There were three counts in the indictment. 1. The first charged 676 that, Israel being indebted *for public dues (tax, county levy and poor rate) to the amount of eighty-one cents, and the same being in the hands of K. Marsh deputy of S. Hall sheriff of Harrison, for collection, he distrained a horse, the property of Israel, for the amount so due from him, and took the horse and put it into the possession of J. Flowers for safe keeping; and that Israel, with force and arms, against the will of Flowers, unlawfully and injuriously, rescued the property, the said tax, county levy and poor rate, remaining still due and unpaid, to the damage of Flowers and Marsh, to the evil example &c. and against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth. 2. The second count charged, that Israel, with force and arms, knowingly and wilfully and without lawful authority, did take and drive away, one horse "then and there being in the possession of J. Flowers," against the will and consent of Flowers, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided,|| and against the peace and Marsh, deputy of S. Hall, sheriff of Harrison." The defendant pleaded not guilty. The jury found him guilty, and assessed a fine of ten dollars upon him. Whereupon, he made a motion in arrest of judgment, because neither count of the indictment alleged any indictable offence. And the court, with the defendant's consent, adjourned to this court, the questions arising on the reasons assigned in arrest of judgment, and the question, what judgment should be given on the verdict, if any one count were good, and the others defective?

677 *W. A. Harrison, for the defendant.

The attorney general, for the commonwealth.

FRY, J. Waiving the question, whether by the statute of 1822-3, ch. 34, § 1, the legislature designed to punish by indictment as for a misdemeanour, the wilful taking and carrying away personal property of any kind whatever, or only property ejusdem generis with that specially there enumerated, this court is of opinion, that the second and third counts of the indictment, which are founded on that statute, are fatally defective, in not averring that the property taken by the defendant belonged to Flowers and to Marsh, respectively. Non constat but that it belonged to the defendant himself. The offence mentioned in the statute, consists in unlawfully taking away the property of another; and it ought to appear by the indictment, that it is the property of another; for every indictment ought to shew, with certainty, that the accused is guilty of the offence punished by the law.

Upon the first count, there is more difficulty. But the court is of opinion, that the taking of the horse there charged, is not so described as to constitute a breach of the peace. It is charged, that the taking was "unlawful and injurious;" and though the usual phrase "with force and arms" is previously inserted, these words alone do not imply such a force as will sustain an indictment. If connected with the description of an ordinary trespass only, they do not shew such a violence as is indictable. Rex v. Storr, 3 Burr. 1698; Rex v. Bake & al. Id. 1731. Rescue seems applicable only to the forcible delivery of a person from arrest or imprisonment, or to the recaption of goods distrained for rent or damage feasant. 6 Bac. Abr. Rescue, A. p. 87. But, without deciding, whether if the property had been taken from the sheriff himself, in the manner stated in this count, it would have been an indictable offence, it seems to the court, that to make it such when the taking is from his private bailee, the defendant should know in what right the bailee held the possession.

The property was his own: if found in the possession of the sheriff, the defendant might be held to know his office, and to be informed of the authority for his acts; and if he took the property from him, he would do it with knowledge and at his peril; but not so in the case of the private bailee. The taking from the private bailee, without knowledge that the property had been distrained by the sheriff, and committed by him to the keeping of the bailee, would be no offence; the defendant could not be presumed or held to know, by what authority he possessed it. 6 Bac. Abr. Rescue, C. p. 89. Now here, it is not averred, that the defendant knew that the property had been distrained by the sheriff, and left by him with Flowers. For aught that appears, he might have been wholly ignorant of it. And the court thinks, that the omission is not cured by the statute of jeofails, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 44, p. 611. For the indictment might have been found true, without any proof of such knowledge in the defendant as was a necessary ingredient to constitute a misdemeanour; and, as it is not necessary to prove what is not averred, we are not to presume that such proof was adduced at the trial. This first count though, at common law, might, indeed, be sustained, if the offence were so described in it, as to bring the case within the influence of the statute of 1822-3, ch. 34, § 1, on which the other two counts are founded. But, without deciding whether the statute would apply to the taking of such property in the manner alleged, it is sufficient to say, that the offence is not charged in this first count, substantially, in the terms of the statute: it is not there charged, that the taking was "knowingly and wilfully, without lawful authority."

ESTILL, J., dissented from the opinion of the court in regard to the first count.

The judgment entered was: "This court is of opinion, that the reasons assigned are sufficient to arrest the judgment."

—Note in Original Edition.

November term 1833. He pleaded not guilty. "Whereupon," the record proceeded, "came a jury, to wit, [here naming them] who being elected, tried and sworn the truth of and upon the premises to speak," found the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree. Then, he made a motion in arrest of judgment, 1. because several of the jurors in the panel of the petty jury, which tried him, were not good and lawful freeholders of Accomack or of any other county of the commonwealth; and 2. because it was not expressly stated in the record, that any of the petty jury were good and lawful freeholders of that or any other county. And the court, with the consent of the prisoner, adjourned to this court, the question, whether the judgment ought to be arrested for the reasons assigned?

SMITH, J. The assignment of error, that several of the jurors were not freeholders, is matter of fact, not appearing by the record; which, therefore, could not be pleaded in arrest of judgment. As to the other objection, there was no necessity to state in the record, that the jurors were good and lawful men. The record, in this case, is in the usual and correct form. It is, therefore, the unanimous opinion of this court, that the errors assigned are not sufficient to arrest the judgment.

680 *Windsor v. The Commonwealth.

December, 1833.

Gaming*—Case at Bar.—Indictment for gaming, charges defendant with unlawful playing with cards, to wit, at the game of all fours, of loo, and of whist, at a public place, to wit, at the store house of G. H. & Co.: HELD.

1. Same—Same—What Necessary for Conviction.—That to convict the defendant, it is incumbent on the prosecutor to prove, that he played at some one of the games specified in the indictment: and

2. Same—Store House—When a Public Place.—That, if the playing was at the store house of G. H. & Co. in the night time, after the business of the day was at an end, and the doors closed, the store house in that state of things, prima facie, was not a public place, though it was so when it was open to the public in the day time.

Error to a judgment of the circuit superior court of Fayette. Windsor was indicted in that court, upon the 5th section of the statute against unlawful gaming, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 147, p. 563. The indictment charged, "that he did unlawfully play at certain games at cards, to wit, the game of all fours, the game of loo, and the game of whist, at a public place, to wit, at the store house of G. Huddleston & Co." The defendant pleaded not guilty. At the trial, his counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, 1. that it was necessary to convict the defendant, that the jury should be satisfied that he played at some one of the games specified in the indictment; and 2. that if the jury should find from the evidence that the playing was at the store house of Huddleston & Co. in the night time, after the business of the day at the store was ended and the doors of the house closed, it ought not to be considered by the jury that the playing was at a public place within the meaning of the statute, no one having a right to enter the house at that time, without the consent of the owner. But the court refused to give such instructions, and the defendant filed exceptions.

Verdict, guilty; and judgment for the fine of twenty dollars imposed by the statute, and the costs of the prosecution.

And now, the defendant presented a petition to this court for a writ of error to the judgment, assigning as errors, the refusal of the court to give the instructions set forth in the bill of exceptions. The writ of error was allowed.

681 *Leigh, for plaintiff in error.

The attorney general, for the commonwealth.

SEMPLE, J. As to the first point: if it be admitted, that the commonwealth might have convicted the accused, on proof of his playing at any one unlawful game, had the indictment charged him with playing at a game at a public place, and that the game was neither bowles, backgammon, chess nor drafts (which are excepted by the statute), it does not follow, that he can be convicted upon this indictment, charging that he played at the game of all fours &c. upon proof of his playing at any unlawful game other than one of the games specified. The attorney chose to frame his indictment differently. That alleges, that the defendant played unlawfully at the game of all fours &c. with cards. The offence here consists in the playing at the game of all fours &c. which are unlawful games, not being either of the games excepted in the statute. The games charged to have been played, became essential ingredients in the offence itself, and could not be rejected as unnecessary or as surplusage. The proof must agree with the allegation, and this would have been required even in a civil case. It was more necessary to prove that the defendant had played at one of the specified games, than it was in Butt's case, 2 Virg. Ca. 18, to prove, that the play took place at the booth of Skinner, as charged in the presentment, and not at the booth of Clark; for, whether the play was at one or other of the booths, it was equally an offence against the statute; but as it was laid to have taken place at the booth of Skinner, proof that it took place at the booth of Clark, was held not to be competent. A majority of the court, therefore, is of opinion, that the court below erred in refusing the first instruction asked for.

Then, as to the second point—To convict the defendant, it was incumbent on the commonwealth to prove, that the play occurred at the store of Huddleston & Co. and that it was a public place at the time

682 of the playing: it was so alleged *in the indictment. Proof that Huddleston & Co.'s house was a store house, at which goods were vended, would establish that it was a public place so long as it was kept open for that purpose. But when the business of the day was ended, the store house was bona fide shut up, the doors closed, it ceased prima facie to be a public place; and in the absence of other proof, it would not be regarded as a public but a private place. When reopened, it again became a public place, in point of fact and legal contemplation. Even when the doors were closed and all sales ceased, the business of the day having ended, it might be shewn by testimony to have been in fact a public place, so as to subject persons engaged at play in the house to the penalties of the statute. The second instruction asked for is not at all inconsistent with this latter proposition. The court understands that instruction as going no farther than to insist, that it was not an offence against the statute, to play at the store house, in the night, after the business of the store was ended, and the doors shut, in the absence of other proof as to the character of the house; that the house did not continue, in that state of things, to be a public place, because it was a store house open to the public in the day time. And this by no means excludes the idea, that it was competent to establish by other proof, that, though shut up at night, as to the ordinary business, it was still, in truth, a public place. The court, therefore, is of opinion, that the circuit superior court erred in refusing to give the second instruction asked for.

*See monographic note on "Gaming" appended to Neal v. Com., 22 Gratt. 917. The principal case was cited in State v. Brast, 31 W. Va. 382, 7 S. E. Rep. 12.

Judgment reversed, and case sent back to the circuit court for a new trial &c.

Arson—County Jail—Indictment—Description of Building—Surplusage.—Indictment for arson describes the house burned as "the county jail and prison of the county of H. being the house of L. J. sheriff and jailor of the said county." HELD, the burning of such jail is felony by the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 160, § 4, and whether the jail may be properly laid to be the house of the sheriff and jailor or not, that part of the description is unnecessary and may be rejected as surplusage.

Petition for a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit superior court of Hanover. Stevens was indicted in that court, tried and convicted of burning the common jail and county prison of Hanover, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of five years according to the verdict. There were several counts in the indictment; in the fourth of which it was charged, that the prisoner feloniously set fire to and burned "the common jail and county prison in the county of Hanover, being the house of Laney Jones, sheriff and jailor of said county." At the trial, the prisoner moved the court to instruct the jury, that Laney Jones, as sheriff and jailor of Hanover, could not legally have any such right of property in the county jail, charged to have been burned, as

684 would sustain the fourth *count in the indictment; but the court refused to give the instruction, and the prisoner excepted to the opinion. And now he presented a petition to this court, for a writ of error, assigning for error, the refusal of the court to give the instruction.

Briggs, for the petitioner.

MAY, J. The first three sections of the statute concerning arson, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 160, p. 587, prohibits the burning of certain houses therein described; jails not being within those provisions. The fourth section prohibits the burning, "either in the day or the night, of any house or houses whatsoever, other than those enumerated in the three first sections." And under this provision, we are of opinion, that the petitioner was indictable for burning the jail and prison of Hanover; and that the indictment properly and sufficiently described the house as the common jail and county prison of that county. Waving the objection, which is felt by some of us, to the form in which this question was presented to the circuit superior court; and not deciding, as two of us are inclined to do, that the jail may properly be termed the house of the sheriff and jailor who keeps the keys and has the control thereof; we are all of opinion, that this portion of the description was intirely unnecessary, and should be regarded as surplusage.

Writ of error denied.

Contempts*—What Constitutes—Statute—Construction.—A circuit superior court orders a subpoena, witnesses to attend the grand jury then in session and they intentionally conceal themselves from the sheriff to prevent the process from being served, and so prevent it from being served, till the grand jury is discharged: HELD, upon the construction of the statute of 1830-31, ch. 11, § 25, that this is not a contempt punishable by the court in a summary manner.

Case adjourned from the circuit superior court of Tazewell. That court, at April term 1834, made a rule upon Deskins and Lockhart returnable instant, to shew cause why they should not be fined and imprisoned for a contempt of the administration of justice, in intentionally concealing themselves (in Jeffersonville, where the court was sitting) from the sheriff, and thereby intentionally preventing him from serving a subpoena upon them, issued by order of the court, ordering them to appear as witnesses before the grand jury then in session, and so concealing themselves there, till the grand jury was discharged. The rule being served upon them, they appeared, and moved the court to discharge it, upon the ground, that by the statute of 1830-31, ch. 11, § 25; (Supp. to Rev. Code, ch. 109, pp. 143, 4,) whereby contempts are defined, the acts in the rule mentioned, do not constitute a contempt punishable in any manner by the court. Whereupon, the court, with the assent of the accused, adjourned the following questions to this court: 1. Whether the acts mentioned in the rule, amounted to a contempt of law and the due administration of justice, punishable by the court? 2. What judgment ought to be given on the motion to discharge the rule? 3. And what disposition ought the court to make of the case?

PER CURIAM. Without intending to intimate an opinion, that Deakins and Lockhart might not be proceeded against by indictment or information, for corruptly endeavouring to obstruct or impede the due administration of justice, this court is unanimously of opinion, that since the 686 statute of 1830-31, defining contempts, and limiting the powers of the courts to inflict punishment for them, the acts imputed in the rule to the defendants, do not amount to a contempt punishable in the summary manner contemplated by the rule; and therefore the motion to discharge the rule ought to be sustained.

The Commonwealth v. Percavil.

July, 1834.

Indictment under Statute—Willful Trespass—Special Verdict—Sufficiency.—Upon an indictment on the statute of 1822-3, ch. 34, § 1, the jury find, in a special verdict, that defendant shot and killed hogs the property of another, the hogs being on defendant's own land at the time of his shooting and killing them: HELD, the verdict is defective and insufficient. In not finding the essential ingredients required by the statute to constitute the misdemeanor, viz. that defendant killed the hogs "knowingly and wilfully without lawful authority."

Same—Same—Construction of Statute.—The provisions of that statute are not confined to property ejusdem generis with that specially there enumerated; and the circumstance of the property destroyed being at the time on defendant's own land does not take the case out of the statute.

Case adjourned from the circuit superiour court of Lancaster. Percavil was indicted in that court, at March term 1834, upon the statute of 1822-3, ch. 34, § 1,† for knowingly and wilfully, without lawful authority, but not feloniously, wounding and killing thirty hogs, the property of E. Brent. Plea, not guilty. The jury found the following verdict: "We of the jury find the defendant guilty, and assess his fine at twenty-one dollars, in case the court shall be of opinion, that the defendant is liable under the presentment made in this case to the penalties of the act to provide for the more effectual punishment of certain offences," [namely the statute above referred to] "for having shot and killed seven hogs

Criminal Law—Verdict for Term of Imprisonment Shorter Than Law Allows—Variance between Verdict and Judgment—Appellate Practice.—In Nemo's Case, 2 Gratt. 558, the verdict of the jury found the accused guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and fixed his term of imprisonment at three years; and upon this verdict the circuit court sentenced him to imprisonment for five years, that being the shortest term prescribed by law for the offence. The judgment, thus varying from the verdict, the general court reversed it for this reason, and the verdict being illegal in ascertaining a term of imprisonment shorter than that prescribed by law, the court set aside the verdict and awarded a venire de novo. In Jones v. Com., 20 Gratt. 855, it is said that this decision is sustained by Gibson v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 111; Com. v. Smith, 2 Va. Cas. 327; Com. v. Percavil, 4 Leigh 686; *Mills v. 687 the property of E. Brent, which "hogs were on the land of the defendant at the time of the shooting and killing thereof." Whereupon, the circuit court adjourned to this court, the following questions: 1. Whether the wounding and killing of hogs, not being upon the land of the owner thereof when they were wounded and killed, nor being at the time in his immediate personal possession, but being on the land of the defendant, is a destruction of personal property, within the meaning of the statute on which the prosecution is founded? 2. What judgment ought to be given upon the proceedings in this cause? And all questions arising upon the record.

PER CURIAM. As to the first question, the court is of opinion, that the legislature did not intend to limit the operation of the statute referred to, to cases of trespass upon property of the same kind as that specially enumerated in the statute; but that by the words "property real or personal" therein contained, it intended to embrace living domestic animals; the usual and ordinary effect of these general words, not being confined by the special enumeration in the preceding part of the statute. And the court is of opinion, that the fact of the property being at the time of the trespass, on the land of the defendant, will not prevent the operation of the statute, if the other constituents required thereby, namely, that the injury or trespass be done knowingly and wilfully, without lawful authority, be found by the jury to exist in the case. Upon the first question, therefore, the court answers in the affirmative.

Upon the second question—Though the jury in the first part of their verdict (in the usual form of general verdicts) find the defendant guilty and assess his fine, they evidently intended by the other part of their verdict, to ask the opinion of the court as to the law upon a particular state of facts. The verdict, therefore, is to be regarded as a special one. Considering it in that light, the state of facts which it contains, and to which the jury asked the court to apply the law, must be taken as presenting all the facts which the 688 jury found to exist in the case; and as the verdict does not contain the essential attributes required by the statute to constitute the misdemeanour, viz. that the defendant shot and killed the hogs "knowingly and wilfully, without lawful authority," it is defective and insufficient. Upon the second question, therefore, the court is of opinion, that no judgment should be rendered, but the verdict should be set aside, and a venire de novo awarded.

Gilliam v. The Commonwealth.

July, 1834.

Criminal Law—Assault and Battery—Witness—Prosecutor.—On an indictment for an assault and battery on the voluntary information of the person assaulted, the informer and prosecutor, being the only witness for the prosecution, is a competent witness, though liable for costs in case defendant is acquitted.

Petition for a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit superior court of Prince George. The grand jury made a presentment against Gilliam, for an assault on a deputy sheriff, and resisting him by force in the lawful discharge of his official duty, upon the information of the deputy sheriff, who was a voluntary informer; upon which an information was filed against Gilliam for the offence. At the trial, the deputy sheriff was the only witness for the prosecution; and the defendant objected to his competency, because, as he was the informer and prosecutor, and so stated to be in the presentment of the grand jury, he was liable for costs in case the defendant was acquitted, by the provision of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 46, p. 611. But the court overruled the objection, and admitted the testimony of the witness; to which the defendant filed exceptions. The jury found him guilty, and assessed a fine of fifty dollars upon him. The court gave judgment for the fine. And now he presented a petition to this court

MAY, J. The question presented in this case, was decided by this court in Baker's case, 2 Virg. Ca. 353, and it is believed, that the practice of all the courts of criminal jurisdiction in the state, has been, from the earliest times, in conformity with that decision. From necessity, or on a principle of public policy, evidence is received from persons who are entitled to rewards on conviction; 1 Phil. Law Ev. 91, [96.]* The reason here is of the same character. The prosecutor was, in this particular case, and in many others, he probably will be, the only witness, by whose testimony the indictment could be sustained. The statute has made him liable for costs, in case the prosecution fails; but it could not have been intended, in such cases, to make the failure of the prosecutions inevitable.

Blunt v. The Commonwealth.

Larceny+—What Constitutes—Felonious Intent—Case at Bar.—If a person obtain possession of a watch from the owner, by a false and fraudulent pretence of buying it for cash, and then carry it away without the consent or knowledge of the owner, he is yet not guilty of larceny, unless it was with a felonious intent that he so obtained possession of the watch and carried it away.

Instructions—Request for.—In State v. Cobbs, 40 W. Va. 718, 22 S. E. Rep. 311, JUDGE BRANNON speaking for the court, said: "In this state, no duty rests on the judge to instruct on the general features of the case, law, or fact. I have said that the matter of instructing as to punishment falls under the law of instructions. Under that, it was not the duty of the judge, unasked, to give the instruction. We are not discussing the question whether it is error for a judge, without request by either side, to give instructions, as in Gwatkin's Case, 9 Leigh 678. I do not doubt that, as held in Blunt's Case, 4 Leigh 689, the court may properly instruct the jury on a question of law when, in its opinion, justice requires such in-in the trial of a criminal cause, may properly instruct the jury on any question of law, when in its opinion justice requires such interposition, though it be not asked by either party.

Error to a judgment of the circuit superior court of Henrico. At the last term of that court, Blunt was indicted, 690 *tried, and convicted by the verdict of the jury, and sentenced by the court, to imprisonment in the penitentiary for two years, according to the verdict, for grand larceny; namely, the stealing of a gold watch, seal and chain, the property of J. Johnson. At the trial, the counsel for the prisoner moved the court to instruct the jury, that if they should find from the evidence, that the prisoner had bargained for the watch with Johnson's clerk, who delivered the same to him on a promise that he would pay the price for it immediately, and that the prisoner carried it away with him, and failed and neglected to return and pay the price, in such case he was not guilty of the larceny charged in the indictment. The court refused to give such instruction; and instructed the jury, that if they should find from the evidence, that the prisoner made a bargain with Johnson's clerk for the watch, in pursuance of which the watch was delivered to him, upon his promise to pay the price immediately, intending that the prisoner might take the watch away, and return immediately and pay for it, then he was not guilty of the larceny. But if the jury should find, from the evidence, that the prisoner obtained possession of the watch by a false and fraudulent pretence of buying it for cash, and then carried it away without the consent or knowledge of the owner's clerk, then he was guilty of the larceny. To these opinions of the court, the prisoner filed exceptions.

And now he presented his petition to this court for a writ of error to the judgment; assigning as errors, 1. that the court erred in refusing to give the instruction to the jury asked by the prisoner's counsel; 2. that the court erred in proceeding, after refusing the instruction asked by the prisoner's counsel, to give any instruction to the jury, not asked by the attorney for the commonwealth or by the counsel for the prisoner; and 3. that the instruction, which the court did give to the jury, was erroneous. The writ of error was allowed.

691 *MAY, J., delivered the resolutions of the court: 1. That the instruction asked by the prisoner's counsel, was properly refused; because, if the prisoner acquired possession of the watch in the manner therein stated, with a felonious interposition, though it be not asked by either party. But the question in point now is whether a court is bound, without request of specific instructions, to give them. It is clearly not so under our practice. Dejarnette's Case, 75 Va. 877; Rosenbaums v. Weeden, 18 Gratt. 785; 4 Minor 747; State v. Caddle, 35 W. Va. 73, 12 S. E. 1068. The cases of Kitty v. Fitzhugh, 4 Rand. (Va.) 600, Brooke v. Young, 3 Rand. (Va.) 106, and Womack v. Circle, 29 Gratt. 192, holding that a party must ask instructions on specific points, and that even when asked the court is not bound to instruct generally on the law of the case, logically negative the claim that it is error for a court not to instruct when not asked. The party must ask specific instructions."

tent at the time to carry it away, and appropriate it to his own use, without paying for it, he may have been guilty of larceny in so doing. 2. That the prisoner's counsel having applied to the court for an instruction on the law, and the court having refused to give it in the precise form in which it was asked, it was correct that the court should give one with such modification as, in its opinion, was legal and proper. For the court may, at all times, instruct the jury on any question of law arising in a cause, if, in its opinion, justice shall require such interposition. 3. That the instruction, however, which was given, was erroneous in this, that although the prisoner may have obtained possession of the watch in the fraudulent manner indicated in the latter part of the instruction; yet, unless he so obtained it, and carried it away, with a felonious intent at the time, he was not guilty of larceny.

The judgment is, therefore, reversed, and the cause sent back to the circuit superiour court of Henrico, for a new trial to be had: in which trial, if any instruction shall be moved for on the same subject, or the evidence shall require it, the court is directed to instruct the jury, that if they shall find from the evidence, that the prisoner with a felonious intent obtained possession of the watch by false and fraudulent pretenses, and afterwards carried away the same, without the consent of the owner or his clerk, then the prisoner is guilty of larceny.

Indictment under Statute—Removing Slaves from County—Fatal Defects.—Indictment on the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 30, for feloniously and fraudulently taking and removing a slave from one county to another, with intent to defraud the owner and deprive him of the property: HELD, fatally defective, after verdict, for want of an averment, that the slave was so taken and removed without the consent of the owner.

Case adjourned from the circuit superiour court of Henrico. Peas was tried in that court, upon an indictment on the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 30, p. 428.† The indictment charged, that the prisoner in the county of Henrico, "feloniously and fraudulently, did take possession of a negro boy named John, a slave, the property of W. Richardson, and did, then and there, feloniously and fraudulently, remove the said slave beyond the limits of the said county of Henrico into the county of Prince George, with intent to defraud the said Richardson, the owner of the said slave, and to deprive him of the said slave, contrary to the form of the statute &c." without expressly charging, that the prisoner so took and removed the slave, without the consent of the owner. The jury found him guilty. Whereupon, he made a motion in arrest of judgment, because it was not averred in the indictment, that the slave was taken and carried from Henrico to Prince George, without the consent of Richardson, the owner; and so no criminal offence was charged in the indictment, and the same was not sufficient in law to warrant any judgment against him upon the verdict. And the court, with the consent of the prisoner adjourned to this court, the question, what judgment ought to be given upon the plea in arrest of judgment?

693 *LOMAX, J., delivered the resolution of the court: That the omission of an averment in the indictment, that it was without the consent of the owner that the slave was removed or carried away, is a fatal defect, not cured by the verdict; and, therefore, that it be certified to the circuit superiour court, that the judgment ought to be arrested.

Petition for a writ of error to a judgment of the corporation court of Petersburg. Anderson, a free negro, was tried for larceny in that court, sitting as a court of oyer and terminer, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for five years. He was prosecuted and tried in the same manner as slaves are prosecuted and tried for the like offences, according to the provisions of the statute of 1831-2, ch. 22, § 11. (See the cases of Weldon and others, ante.) And now he presented a petition to this court, complaining of irregularities in the trial, and praying a writ of error.

MAY, J. The court cannot look into the alleged errors. There are two preliminary inquiries: Whether a writ of error lies to the proceedings of the county or corporation courts sitting as courts of oyer and terminer? And if so, whether it may be allowed by this court, or must be by the circuit superiour court of Petersburg?

†The statute enacts, that "whosoever shall carry, or cause to be carried, any slave or slaves out of this commonwealth, or shall carry, or cause to be carried, any slave or slaves out of any county or corporation within this commonwealth, into any other county or corporation within the same, without the consent of the owner or owners of such slave or slaves, or of the guardian of such owner or owners, if he, she or they be a minor or minors, and with intention to deprive such owner or owners of such slave or slaves, shall be adjudged guilty of felony &c."

check on a bank, if there be proof rendering it highly probable that the original paper has been lost or destroyed, though this was not done by the accused or by his procurement, secondary evidence of the contents, character and description, of the paper, is admissible to sustain the prosecution.

Petition for a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit superiour court of Henrico. Pendleton was indicted and tried there, for forging and counterfeiting a check in the name of Bagwell, Smith & Williams on the bank of Virginia, payable to Pendleton or bearer, for 200 dollars; and for passing and uttering the check as genuine, knowing it to be a forgery.

At the trial, the attorney for the commonwealth called a witness, Dudley, who testified, that he received a check from the prisoner, of which he retained a copy and delivered the original to D. Miller; he produced the copy which corresponded exactly with the check described in the indictment. Miller testified, that he delivered the original check to D. Wilson. Wilson testified, that he delivered it, with sundry other checks, to J. Talley; that Talley, in his presence, burned all the checks so delivered to him except one which he kept; but whether the one so kept by Talley, was the same that was delivered by Dudley to Miller and by Miller to this witness, he did not know. Talley testified, that he received several checks from Wilson, and 695 *burned all but one, which he retained and put in his pocket book; that he had since seen it among his papers; that two or three weeks before the trial, he had looked among his papers for the check, and for other purposes, and could not find it; that not having been apprised that he was to be examined as a witness till he was called, he had made no thorough search among his papers for the single purpose of finding the check; he did not know that it had been destroyed; it was possible that it was still among his papers; but he believed it was not among them, and that it was lost. The attorney for the commonwealth then shewed a written notice, which had been served on the prisoner some time before the trial, that he would be required to produce the check (describing it) at the passing a counterfeit coin. On his trial, the prisoner objected to the admission of any testimony to prove the passing of the coin, or that the same was forged or counterfeit, without the production of the piece of money alleged to be forged and passed. In answering this objection, ALLEN, J. who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "The absence of the forged pieces may increase the difficulty of proving the prisoner's guilt: but there seems to be no good reason for rejecting evidence tending to satisfy the jury of the fact of the felonious passing, and that the pieces passed were counterfeit. If the rule were as contended for, then secondary evidence could never be received in a prosecution for forgery; for the objection covers the whole ground, that the production of the forged piece was essential, and that all testimony to prove its counterfeit character and the felonious passing was inadmissible unless the coin was produced. The contrary has been repeatedly established by the courts in this country and in England. Pendleton's Case, 4 Leigh 694; 2 Russell 674."

To the point that, on a trial for forgery, the instrument alleged to be forged is the best evidence of itself and its contents, and therefore its production can never be dispensed with unless unavoidable, the principal case was cited in State v. Lowry, 42 W. Va. 208, 24 S. E. Rep. 562.

See further, monographic note on "Forgery and Counterfeiting" appended to Coleman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 885.

trial, and that if it should not be produced, other evidence of its contents, character and description, would be offered to sustain the prosecution. And, accordingly, the original not being produced, he offered secondary evidence of the contents, character and description, of the check; namely, the copy of it produced by Dudley. The prisoner's counsel objected, that such secondary evidence, if competent in any case, was not competent under the circumstances proved in this case. But the court being satisfied that it was impracticable to produce the original check, and that reasonable diligence had been used to procure it without effect, overruled the objection, and admitted the secondary evidence; to which opinion the counsel for the prisoner filed exceptions.

The jury found the prisoner guilty, and the court sentenced him to imprisonment in the penitentiary for two years, according to the verdict.

And now he presented a petition to this court for a writ of error, assigning for error, the admission of the secondary evidence of the contents, character and description of the check.

Scott, for the petitioner. To permit the prosecutor to resort to evidence of the contents of a paper alleged to be 696 *forged, without producing the original, except in cases where the paper is withheld by the accused, or has been destroyed by him, or by his procurement, would be to deprive him, in many cases, of the highest evidence of his innocence. It would render him unable to prove the paper genuine. If, indeed, the original be traced to the possession of the prisoner, and he will not produce it, or if it be shewn that he has destroyed it, or procured it to be destroyed; in any such case, it is admitted, secondary evidence of its contents would be proper. But, in a case like this, in which the paper, if destroyed or lost at all, has been destroyed or lost by another person, without the procurement, connivance or knowledge of the prisoner; as the absence of the primary evidence may deprive the prisoner of the means of making a just defence, without any fault of his own, the secondary evidence ought not to be admitted. Accordingly, it will be found on examination, that in all the cases in which secondary evidence of the contents of a paper charged to be forged, has been admitted, a foundation has been laid for the admission of the secondary evidence, by proof that the original was in the possession of the accused himself, or had been destroyed by him. 1 Chitt. Crim. Law 566, 7, and the cases there cited. It is obvious, that a notice to the party, to produce an original paper, shewn by the prosecutor not to be in his possession, or within his reach or control, is nugatory; and the requisition of such notice, therefore, shews the necessity of tracing the paper to his possession. But, in the present case, was there any foundation laid for the admission of the secondary evidence? The original was traced to the witness Talley. He testified, that he kept one check and burned others; that two or three weeks before, he had looked over his papers to find the check he did retain, and for other purposes, and could not find it; but he had not made a thorough search among his papers with the single purpose of finding this paper; nor could he have done so, being called as a witness suddenly and unexpectedly: he believed it was lost. Surely, for aught that appears, *the paper may be still in existence among Talley's papers; and time should (as it certainly might) have been given him, to make a thorough search for it.

SUMMERS, J. The question is, whether the circumstances proved formed a sufficient ground for the admission of the secondary evidence of the contents, character and description, of the check? The general rule, which runs alike through civil and criminal proceedings, that the best evidence which the nature of the case admits of must be produced, is intended to preclude all testimony, which from its very nature supposes that the party offering it has it in his power to produce better evidence. But wherever an original paper is shewn to have been lost or destroyed, or is in the hands of the party himself, the prosecutor may give a copy in evidence, or if not, parol evidence of its contents; because, in each of those cases, the presumption of the prosecutor having it in his power to produce better evidence is repelled. In this case, the inquiry seems to be narrowed down to the sufficiency of the search made by the witness Talley, for the original paper. His testimony is not so perfectly simple, direct and positive, as it might have been; but the bare possibility that the paper might have been found on a more diligent search, was no good reason for excluding the evidence. The burning of the checks handed to Talley by Wilson, made it extremely doubtful, whether the check on which the prosecution was founded, was not one of those committed to the flames, probably for the protection of the prisoner. If the retained check may have been the one in question, the failure to produce it was not owing to any fault of the prosecutor; nor can any presumption possibly arise of an unjust suppression by him of the primary evidence. The mind of the witness Talley himself was satisfied, that the paper was lost; and the judge, to whom this preliminary inquiry belonged, was satisfied by the examination, of the correctness of the conclusion of the witness. This court ought not to interfere, unless error is made apparent. We are *unanimously of opinion, that there is no error. If authorities be necessary to sustain this opinion, they may be found in 2 Russel on Crimes, book 6, ch. 3, § 2, p. 674, and the cases there referred to, and the case of The Commonwealth v. Snell, 3 Mass. Rep. 82.

ADVERSARY POSSESSION.

C. being seized of land in fee, agrees to sell and convey the same to J. and receives the purchase money, and puts him in possession, but does not make a conveyance to him; J. agrees to sell and convey the same land to W. and puts him in possession, but W. not paying the purchase money, this contract is rescinded, and W. agrees to give up to J. all his claim to the land; W. nevertheless, remains in possession, without paying any rent, and without pretence of title; and while W. is thus in possession, C. conveys the title to J. by deed of bargain and sale: HELD, W.'s possession was not an adversary one, and, therefore, C.'s deed to J. passed the legal title to him, so that C. cannot maintain a writ of right against W. for the land.

ARBITRATION AND AWARD.

Misconduct of arbitrators.

1. Award of arbitrators sought to be set aside, on the ground that the conduct of the arbitrators had the effect of a surprise on one of the parties, and so was misconduct, though no partiality or corruption was imputed to them; and HELD, upon all the circumstances of the case, that there was nothing in the proceedings of the arbitrators to invalidate the award.

2. What is a valid gift of a bond. See Gift, and Elam v. Keen, 333

3. What is performance of contract to assign and deliver a bond. See Contract No. 7, and Daniels v. Conrad, 401

Liability of assignee of lease.

4. In general, the assignee of a term of years is not liable for breaches of the covenants in the lease before the assignment—but, if the assignee, by express covenant with his assignor, bind himself to pay the rents, and perform all the covenants in the lease contained, and required to be done and performed on the part of the lessee,—such a covenant not only binds the assignee to fulfil the covenants during his own time, but makes him liable for breaches before his time.

Farmers Bank v. Mutual Assurance Society &c. and others, 69

Assignor's liability on contract of assignment.

5. C. assigns to H. a bond of W. payable on demand; if the obligor is insolvent at the time of the assignment, it is not necessary that the assignee should bring suit on the bond against him, in order to entitle himself to recourse against the assignor. Cotner v. Hausbarger, 452

6. In such case the assignor is immediately liable to the assignee upon the contract of assignment. S. C., 452

7. A bond payable on demand is assigned by the holder to a third person; the obligor is insolvent at the time of the assignment, and so continues; the assignee forbears to bring suit against the obligor, and makes an arrangement with him, whereby he agrees to receive payment at a future day; the assignor being informed of the fact, though ignorant of the legal effect thereof to discharge him from liability, sanctions the arrangement, and promises payment of the debt to the assignee: HELD, the assignor is bound by such his promise to pay. S. C., 452

8. Upon a bond assigned for valuable consideration, the assignees bring suit against the obligor-recover judgment, and sue out a f. fa. which is levied, and a forthcoming bond taken, and that being returned forfeited, execution is awarded thereon against principal and surety, and a f. fa. is sued out on the forthcoming bond; and on this execution, the sheriff returns nulla bona as to the surety, but not as to the principal; then, the assignees bring suit against the assignors, and after trial and verdict for defendants, court allows the sheriff to amend his return, and to return nulla bona as to the principal in the forthcoming bond; and gives plaintiff leave to amend his declaration, and to count on the amended return: HELD, it was right to permit the sheriff so to amend his return, and to permit the plaintiffs so to amend their declaration. Smith & Rickard v. Triplett & Neale, 500

9. In the action between the assignees and assignors the sheriff's return of nulla bona on the execution against the obligors in the forthcoming bond, though amended after the assignees' action and five years after the return, so as to shew the insolvency of both, is conclusive evidence of such insolvency. S. C., 500

10. In such case, the insolvency of the debtors might be proved by other evidence, but the assignees have a right to the conclusive evidence of the sheriff's return. S. C., 500

11. It seems, the deputy sheriff in whose hands the execution on the forthcoming bond was placed, is a competent witness to prove the insolvency of the obligors. S. C., 500

12. The taking of a forthcoming bond, on a judgment and execution against the obligor of an assigned bond, is not such a satisfaction of the judgment, as will preclude the assignees from having recourse against the assignors. S. C., 500

13. When assignees have recovered judgment on the assigned bond, and sued execution against the obligor, and that execution is returned nulla bona, they are entitled to recourse against the assignors; and it is no defence for the assignors to shew neglect or malfeasance in the sheriff; the assignors, as parties injured, may sue the sheriff for such misconduct; the assignees are not bound to sue him, before they have recourse against the assignors, upon the contract of assignment. S. C., 500

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. Whenever a bill of exceptions to an instruction of the court to a jury, on the trial of an issue, is so vague and imperfect, that the appellate court cannot ascertain the exact state of the case, nor consequently the import and effect of the instruction, it is the settled practice, to reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and remand the cause for a new trial.

Bowyer v. Chesnut, 1

2. In a case brought before an appellate court, on complaint of error in a particular point stated in a bill of exceptions, the appellate court will regard only that point, and will not look into objections that might have been, but were not, made in the court below. Barrett v. Wills, 114

BILL OF EXCHANGE.

Suit by indorsee against drawer.

1. In an action by indorsee against drawer of a bill of exchange, it is found by special verdict, that the bill was drawn in Maryland on a person in Virginia, and no law of Maryland found, declaring such a bill an inland bill: HELD, the court cannot take judicial notice of any law of Maryland to that effect, unless it be expressly found; and such bill being a foreign bill of exchange, according to the general law merchant, it must be so regarded. Brown & Sons v. Ferguson, 37

2. Every party upon a bill of exchange, even (it seems) a party who is a mere agent for collection, indorsing the bill, though only for the purpose of collection, is entitled to one full day, to give notice to the party next before him, in succession. S. C., 37

3. But the over diligence of one party to a bill, shall not supply the under diligence of others; and though the drawer or indorser sought to be charged, in fact receive notice as early as he would have been regularly entitled to it, yet the holder, in order to charge him, is bound to shew due diligence in each and every party through whose hands the bill has passed, the onus probandi, in such case, lying on the plaintiff, to prove due diligence, not on the defendant, to prove negligence. S. C., 37

4. A bill of exchange is drawn by a creditor on his debtor, payable sixty days after date; the drawee being advised thereof, before acceptance, writes to the drawer, that he will be unable to pay the bill at its maturity; whereupon the drawer, by letter to the drawee, authorizes him, when the bill approaches maturity, to redraw on himself, in order to raise funds to honour the bill; the drawee redraws accordingly, and then the drawer refuses to accept his bill; but no credit is given, by the holder or any other person, to the drawee, on the faith of the drawer's authority to him so to redraw: HELD, the drawer has not, by this authority to the drawee to redraw, waived notice of dishonor of his own bill, nor do the facts constitute any excuse for neglect to give such notice; nor is there any assumption to the holder, but only a promise to the drawee, which being without consideration, is not binding. S. C., 37

BOND.

I. Validity of bond.

1. A bail bond is executed by the principal and the bail, though the name of the bail is not inserted in the body of the bond (there being a blank left for his name) which, in other respects, is a regular bail bond: HELD, this is the bond of the bail, though his name is not inserted in the body of it. Raynolds v. Gore, 276

II. Forthcoming bond.

2. See title Forthcoming bond.

III. Transfer of bond.

BURGLARY.

What the indictment must charge.

An indictment charging that goods were feloniously and burglariously taken from a dwelling house, without charging that this was done in the

CAPIAS AD RESPONDENDUM.

Return day.

A capias ad respondendum is made returnable to the next term generally, instead of the first day of the term as the statute requires; the writ is executed before the term and returned to the first day; an office judgment is entered at rules; at the ensuing term, defendant moves to quash the writ and all the proceedings on it at rules, on the ground that the writ being returnable to term generally, was naught; and the court overrules the motion: HELD, the motion was rightly overruled.

Hare v. Niblo, 359

703 *CAPIAS AD SATISFACIENDUM.

Lien of ca. sa. executed.

A. recovers a judgment against B. at August term, and sues out a ca. sa. thereon in October, under which B. is taken in execution, and in November takes the oath of insolvency, and is discharged, under the statute for the relief of insolvent debtors; in the interval between the date of A.'s judgment and the service of his ca. sa. on B. sundry mortgages are executed by B. and duly recorded, to secure sundry debts to other creditors: HELD, that by the actual service of A.'s ca. sa. on B. the lien of A.'s judgment was destroyed, and A. could then stand only on the lien given to the ca. sa. executed by the statute of executions, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 10, and that, therefore, the mortgages are entitled to the benefit of their mortgages.

Rogers & brothers v. Marshall and others, 425

CAVEATS.

Upon the construction of the 38th section of the general land law, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 86, HELD, that a person holding a perfect legal title to lands by grant from the commonwealth, may maintain a caveat to prevent the issuing of a junior grant to another person.

Hardman v. Boardman, 377

CHARITIES.

Testator bequeaths "to the school commissioners and their successors of South Farnham district, Essex county, for the schooling of the poor children of that district, 1000 dollars, to be put out at interest, and the interest only to be applied for the schooling of said poor children;" there are school commissioners of the county of Essex, and testator was one of them at his death, but they are not a corporate body; there are no school commissioners of South Farnham district, nor any such district, that being only the name of an ancient parish: HELD, the bequest is void.

CLERICAL ERRORS.

1. Judgment upon nil dic't in county court, entered on the minute book, "for specialty and costs," and then entered at large, by the clerk, in the order book for debt with interest from 1st March 1817, the date of the specialty, though the day of payment appointed in the condition was the 1st March 1818; the clerk, in his entry in the order book, following, not the condition of the bond, but a memorandum thereon indorsed, that the debt if not punctually paid should bear interest from the date of the bond: HELD, 1. it was error to give interest from the date of bond, instead of the day of payment; and 2. this error was a clerical mistake, amendable by the court, at a subsequent term.

Eubank and others v. Ralls's ex'or, 308

2. A like error in entering an office judgment in the county court, in debt on a like bond; and HELD, a clerical mistake amendable in like manner. S. C., 308

3. A like error in entering an office judgment in circuit court, in debt on a like bond; and HELD, a clerical mistake, amendable in like manner. S. C., 308

CONTEMPTS.

A circuit superiour court orders a subpoena for witnesses to attend the grand jury then in session, and they intentionally conceal themselves from the sheriff to prevent the process from being served, and so prevent it from being served, till the grand jury is discharged: HELD, upon the construction of the statute of 1830-31, ch. 11, § 26, that this is not a contempt punishable by the court in a summary manner.

Gore v. Buzzard's adm'rs, 231

IV. Performance.

7. Defendant agrees to assign, transfer and deliver a title bond to plaintiff; defendant gives an order on third persons requiring them to deliver the bond to plaintiff, and containing an assignment thereof to him; and this order is given by defendant, and accepted by plaintiff, in lieu of an actual delivery of the bond: Held, the delivery of the order was tantamount to a delivery of the bond, and a full performance of the contract on defendant's part, whether plaintiff obtained the bond or not.

COUNTY AND CORPORATION COURTS.

I. Jurisdiction.

1. A county court in chancery has no jurisdiction to stay proceedings at law on a judgment of a circuit court, by injunction; and if the county court issue such injunction, the circuit court ought to disregard it.

2. Criminal jurisdiction. See Slaves, free negroes and mulattoes No. 2, 3, and Commonwealth v. Weldon, 652

II. Writ of error.

3. A writ of error does not lie from the general court to a judgment of a county or corporation court, sitting as a court of *oyer and terminer, in a criminal prosecution under the statute of 1831-2, ch. 22, § 11.

2. Concerning liability of assignee or mortgagee of lease, see Assignment No. 4, Mortgages and trusts No. 6, and Farmers Bank v. Mut. Ass. Society &c. et al., 69

3. Limitation of debt on judgment where execution issued, and no return made. See Judgment No. 4, and

Fleming's ex'or v. Dunlop &c., 336

4. In debt upon a promissory note against H. and B.—H. being the principal debtor and B. the surety, and the declaration counting on the note alone.—B. pleads, severally, the statute of limitations, the plaintiff replies generally, and issues: Held, that proof of an acknowledgment of the debt by H. the principal, within five years next before the action brought, does not sustain this issue on the plaintiff's part.

Butcher v. Hixton, 519

5. If in any case of an action of debt on simple contract, the plaintiff would rely on a subsequent acknowledgment, to take the case out of the statute of limitations, it seems, he must count on such subsequent acknowledgment in his declaration; otherwise, in an action of assumpsit. S. C., 519

6. In debt on a promissory note negotiable at bank, by holders against indorser, the indorser pleads the general issue, with leave to give the statute of limitations in evidence; and, at the trial, the plaintiffs prove a conditional promise made by the indorser to pay the debt, within the period of limitation: Held, such conditional promise does not suffice to take the case out of the statute, unless performance of the condition be shewn.

*DECEIT.

In sale of a chattel.

1. In an action for deceit in a sale of a chattel, there is a plea of the statute of limitations, a general replication thereto, and issue thereon joined: Held, the cause of action accrued at the time of the deceit practised, and the limitation begins to run immediately.

Rice v. White, 474

2. It seems, that if the fraud was not discovered till some time after it was practised and within the time of limitation, this would suffice to take the case out of the statute; but to enable the plaintiff to avail himself of such matter, he must plead specially in his replication. S. C., 474

3. Quære, in an action for deceit in the sale of a slave, by vendee against vendor, what is the proper measure of damages? the purchase money with interest, or the value at the time the property was recovered from the vendee for defect in the vendor's title? S. C., 474

DECREES IN CHANCERY.

I. What is a final decree.

1. Testator by his will desires, that, when his affairs are settled and all his debts paid, his slaves be emancipated according to law, and those under age and over forty to be equally in the care of his wife, son and daughter, and that the above may be done by his executors; upon bill in chancery by slaves (suing in forma pauperis) against the executor, charging that ample fund has been raised out of their profits to pay debts, and praying an account of administration, and of their profits, and decree for their manumission and for excess of profits above the debts, the chancellor, in 1809, finding that ample fund to pay the debts has been raised out of the profits, though debts not yet finally liquidated and paid, decrees, that the executor shall manumit them, reserving liberty to them to resort to the court for a distribution of any surplus of profits which might remain after liquidation and payment of debts, or for other arrangement in respect to such surplus: Held, the decree is a final decree as to the manumission, but makes no disposition of the surplus of profits.

Paup's adm'r and others v. Mingo &c., 163

2. Testator bequeaths, that his executor shall pay his daughter $25. per annum so long as she shall remain single; and devises and bequeaths to his son, all his estate, real and personal, which shall remain after payment of debts and legacies; the son is the executor; he takes under the will large real and personal estate, either of which is amply sufficient to satisfy all legacies: he sells the real, wastes the personal, and dies insolvent. Upon a bill by the daughter against the purchaser of the real estate, and two sons of a deceased surety of the executor in his executorial bond, holding estate of the surety, the chancellor decrees, that the sons should each pay one half of the annuities in arrear, and the costs of suit, reserving liberty to the plaintiff, if the decree should prove unavailing against either, to resort to the court for a further decree against the other, and ordering the cause to be retained in court for the purpose of taking further accounts as to the annuities to accrue in future: HOLD, notwithstanding the reservation, this is a final decree, from which no appeal can be taken after the lapse of three years from its date.

DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

1. On the trial of an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, brought by the heirs of R. A., the defendant demurs to the plaintiffs' evidence: and by the evidence stated in the demurrer, it appears, that R. A. died seized; there is no positive proof that the plaintiffs, his heirs, ever entered after his death; but there is proof that the defendant's possession did not commence till a year after R. A.'s death: HOLD, that, on this evidence in a demurrer to evidence, it may fairly be inferred, that R. A.'s heirs entered into possession immediately upon their ancestor's death; and that, therefore, they are entitled to recover.

DETINUE.

Liability of special bail in detinue.

1. By recognizance of special bail in detinue, taken by a justice in the country, the bail is made to undertake, that in case the principal shall be cast, he shall restore the chattels sued for, or the alternative value thereof (without adding "as the court shall adjudge"), or pay and satisfy the condemnation of the court, or render his body in execution &c. or that the bail will do it for him: HOLD, this is a good recognizance of special bail, according to the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 53.

Cloud v. Catlett's ex'or, 462
2. In scire facias upon a recognizance of special bail in detinue, it is not necessary that the scire facias should shew, that the execution against the principal had been superseded for the specific thing and given for the alternative value, according to the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 43, and a scire facias omitting to state such matter, is good on general demurrer. S. C., 462

3. It is necessary to charge the special bail in detinue, that the execution against the principal should be superseded as to the specific thing and given for the alternative value, and that a ca. sa. should be sued out against the principal, without effect; but if these proceedings be omitted, it is matter of defence for the bail, of which he can avail himself only by plea; dissentiente TUCKER, P. EMANCIPATION.

I. Construction of instrument.

1. Testator bequeathed, that his negro woman C. and her child A. and C.'s increase be given to G. D. in trust to be sent to the colony of Liberia, provided the expense of sending them would be defrayed by the colonization society; and that the rest of his negroes who might be willing to go, should also be left in trust to said G. D. to be sent to Liberia in same manner; but that those who should prefer to stay here, should be given, within twelve months, to his brother. Testator's estate being involved in debts, which the other personal assets did not suffice to pay, the executor hired out the slaves for several years, to raise a fund out of the profits to pay debts: HOLD, 1. This was an effectual emancipation of such of the slaves as preferred to go to Liberia; and it was not necessary to perfect their title to freedom, that they should elect to go within the year, provided they made such election when it was offered to them,—or that the colonization society should agree to defray the expense of sending them, provided any person would agree to do so.

Elder v. Elder's ex'or, 253

2. The slaves born after the testator's death and while the executor held their mothers in slavery, were also emancipated. S. C., 253

3. As to the infant slaves incapable to make election for themselves, it was right to take the election of their mothers for them. S. C., 253

II. Executor's duty where estate is indebted.

4. The executor did right in hiring the slaves out, in order to raise a fund out of their profits to pay testator's debts, and consequently in forbearing to offer the slaves their election to go to Liberia within the year; for,

5. When slaves emancipated by will, are set free by the executor, he is not entitled to a refunding bond to indemnify him against the claims of the testator's creditors, though the manumitted slaves are, notwithstanding manumission, subject to debts; and.

6. The burden of debts ought to be distributed among such freedmen as equally as practicable. S. C., 252

* ESCHEATS.

1. Upon a petition under the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 82, § 14, by the creditor of a person whose lands have been escheated, the creditor is required to make affidavit that the amount of his demand is bona fide due, but this requisition of the statute does not dispense with the necessity of other evidence; the court can only render judgment for such sum as is proved to be due.

Watson v. Lyle's adm'r, 236

2. If judgment has been rendered for the whole amount of the demand, when the whole is not proved to be due, and it is uncertain to what part the proof extends, an appellate court will reverse the judgment and dismiss the petition. S. C., 236

7. In assumpsit, there are two counts; one for the agreed price of goods sold; the other, quantum valebant for the same; on the general issue, the proof is, that plaintiff, being a tanner, received raw hides from defendant, and credited him for the value, and sent him in return tanned leather, and debited him with the value thereof, and the debt claimed is the balance appearing due the tanner on these dealings; HELD, the proof is properly applicable to, and sustains the declaration.

Gore v. Buzzard's adm'r, 231

8. Replication to the plea of the statute of limitations, that the accounts concerned the trade of merchandize between merchant and merchant; no evidence is adduced to prove that either party was a merchant during the time of the dealings between them, nor any evidence of the character of those dealings but that furnished by the account of the petitioner; in which account, the debits to the alleged debtor consisted of two items for cash paid him on account of bills of exchange, one item for goods sold him, and the other items for cash advanced to or for him, and there was a single credit for the proceeds of a bill of exchange bought of him; HELD, that the replication was not supported by the evidence, and the demand therefore was barred by the statute.

Watson v. Lyle's adm'r, 236

9. Defendant agrees to assign, transfer and deliver a title bond to plaintiff; defendant gives an order on third persons requiring them to deliver the bond to plaintiff, and containing an assignment thereof to him; and this order is given by defendant, and accepted by plaintiff, in lieu of an actual delivery of the bond; HELD, the delivery of the order was tantamount to a delivery of the bond, and a full performance of the contract on defendant's part, whether plaintiff obtained the bond or not.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

I. Right to administration.

1. The person entitled to the estate of a decedent, is entitled to the administration.

Thornton v. Winston, 152

2. A testator by his will gives personal property to his wife, and she takes the provision made for her by the will; HELD, she is entitled to no part of an undisposed of residuum, as distributee of her husband, being excluded from distribution by the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 104, § 26, and in a contest between the widow and a distributee, for administration with the will annexed, the distributee is entitled to it. S. C., 153

II. Renunciation of executorship.

3. There may be a valid renunciation of the executorship of a will, by matter in pais. S. C., 152

4. An executrix declines to qualify as such, and agrees that administration with the will annexed shall be granted to her daughter, reserving her right to qualify after her daughter's death; HELD, this renunciation of the executorship is absolute and perpetual, and cannot be retracted after the death of the administratrix, nor does the nomination of the executrix in the will, give her any preferable right to the administration de bonis non with the will annexed. S. C., 152

11. The sureties of an executrix require counter security from her under the statute of wills of 1792, ch. 92, § 25, and she failing to give counter security, the court orders her to deliver the testator's estate then in her hands, consisting of slaves, to her sureties; she delivers the estate to them, and they receive the profits for several years; then the executrix dies, and there is an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of the testator; the sureties having never settled any account of their transactions while the estate was in their hands, a suit in chancery is brought by the administrator de bonis non against the sureties, for an account of the profits, to which the legatees of the testator are not parties: HELD, the suit well brought, the administrator, nor the legatees, being entitled to demand the account of profits and the balance due thereon. FEME COVERT.

Relinquishment of dower.

1. In the commission for the examination of a feme covert touching a deed executed by husband and wife, and in the certificate of the privy examination and acknowledgment of the wife, under the statute of 1792, 1 Old Rev. Code, ch. 90, § 6, it is not necessary, that the requisitions of the statute be literally followed, to make the deed binding on the wife; it is enough, if they be substantially complied with. Langhorne v. Hobson. 224
2. What shall be regarded as a substantial and sufficient compliance with the requisitions of the statute, to make the deed binding on the wife. S. C., 224
3. Deed of husband and wife is first recorded as to the husband; then a commission for the privy examination of the wife is issued, and executed; and then the commission and privy examination of the wife are recorded: the deed is hereby perfected as to the wife, though it does not appear that she had signed and sealed it at the time when it was recorded as to the husband. S. C., 224
4. A certificate of a privy examination of a feme covert to a conveyance of real estate by husband and wife, before commissioners in the country, under the statute of conveyances of 1792, states, that the feme made her acknowledgment of the conveyance of the land contained in the conveyance thereto annexed, freely and voluntarily, and that she was willing the same should be recorded, without stating that the feme declared that she had willingly signed and sealed the deed, and without stating that it was shewn and explained to her by the commissioners: HELD, if the feme had in fact signed the deed, such certificate of privy examination is substantially a compliance with the requisitions of the statute, and good, and the feme is bound by the deed; but if the feme had not signed the deed, such acknowledgment, so certified, is not sufficient to make the deed binding on her, within the requisitions of the statute.

FORGERY.

Secondary evidence.

On the trial of an indictment for forgery of a check on a bank, if there be proof rendering it highly probable that the original paper has been lost or destroyed, though this was not done by the accused or by his procurement, secondary evidence of the contents, character and description, of the paper, is admissible to sustain the prosecution. Pendleton v. Commonwealth. 604

FORTHCOMING BOND.

I. Limitation of motion on bond.

1. The statute of limitations, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 5, whereby the remedy on a judgment by debtor scire facias is limited to ten years, is no bar to a motion on a forthcoming bond of more than ten years standing. Lipscomb's adm'r v. Davis's adm'r. 303

II. Effect of forfeiture.

2. It seems, that a forthcoming bond has not the force of a judgment, till it is returned forfeited and filed in the clerk's office; and even after it is filed, it is only in a partial sense, that it has the force of a judgment before execution upon it is awarded. S. C., 303

*II. As between vendee and creditors of vendor.

2. An absolute bill of sale of slaves is executed by B. to C. for valuable consideration, and the slaves are delivered by vendor to vendee; and then vendee hires the slaves to vendor, for their victuals and clothes, taxes and levies, till the end of the ensuing year; the sale and the hiring are both bona fide transactions; at the end of the year, vendee takes possession of the slaves, holds them for several years, and then dies; a creditor of vendor recovers judgment against him, after vendee has taken possession of the slaves, and levies his execution on the slaves in the hands of vendee's executor: HELD, in a controversy between such creditor of the vendor and the executor of the vendee, that the slaves are the property of the vendee's estate, and not subject to execution at the suit of such creditor of the vendor. Sydnor v. Gee &c.. 536

3. It seems, that, in the case of an absolute sale and delivery of chattels, and an immediate redelivery thereof by vendee to vendor, upon bailment, for a limited time, on valuable consideration, both transactions being in fact fair, such bailment of vendee to vendor is not inconsistent with the sale, so as to make the sale fraudulent per se, within the rule of Edwards v. Harben, 2 T. R. 567. Sydnor v. Gee &c.. 535

4. If an absolute sale of chattels, fair in itself, be not accompanied and followed by immediate possession, but possession is taken by the vendee before the rights of any creditor of the vendor attach, the sale is good against the vendor's creditors. S. C., 535

FREEDOM—Suits for.

I. Right to profits of emancipated slaves.

1. Testator by his will desires, that, when his affairs are settled and all his debts paid, his slaves be emancipated according to law, and those under age and over forty to be equally in the care of his wife, son and daughter, and that the above may be done by his executors: upon bill in chancery by slaves (suing in forma pauperis) against the executor, charging that ample fund has been raised out of their profits to pay debts, and praying an account of administration, and of their profits, and decree for their manumission and for excess of profits above the debts, the chancellor, in 1809, finding that ample fund to pay the debts has been raised out of the profits, though debts not yet finally liquidated and paid, decrees, that the executor shall manumit them, reserving liberty to them to resort to the court, for a distribution of any surplus of profits which might remain after liquidation and payment of debts, or for other arrangement in respect to such surplus: the debts are not finally liquidated and paid till 1827, when there appears a surplus of profits: and now, the freedmen claim this surplus, the testator's next of kin claim it, and the executor claims it: Held, 1. the freedmen are not entitled to the surplus of profits accruing while they were actually held in bondage: negroes recovering freedom by suit in forma pauperis, cannot, in any case, recover profits or damages. 2. The executor is not entitled to the surplus of profits, but the same is part of his testator's estate undisposed of by his will, which belongs to his next of kin.

Paup's adm'r &c. v. Mingo &c., 163

II. Proof of executor's assent to emancipation.

2. Testator bequeaths, that all his slaves who at the time of his death should be 40 years of age, should serve one year and no longer, and then be emancipated; all who should then be 30 and under 40, should serve till they should be 40, and then be emancipated; all who should be 20 and under 30, should serve till they should be 35, and then be emancipated; and all under 20 should serve till they should be 31, and then be emancipated:

In an action at law, brought by one of the slaves, who was under 20 at testator's death and now 31, to recover his freedom, the defendant demurs to the evidence, which consists, 1. of the testator's will; 2. proof that the executor, not long after testator's death, assented to liberation of four slaves who were then by the will entitled to freedom; 3. proof, that, in the opinion of witnesses, and as the executor himself had said, in open court, the testator's estate, other than his slaves, was amply sufficient for payment of his debts, though executor's accounts of administration had never been settled; and 4. proof, that the pauper plaintiff was, in the executor's presence, sold under execution on a judgment against the executor for a debt of the testator, under which sale defendant claims: Held, from such evidence, stated in demurrer to evidence, the assent of the executor to the emancipation of the plaintiff under his testator's will, 713 may fairly be inferred; and, therefore, *the plaintiff is entitled to judgment of freedom.

III. Whether executor's assent to emancipation is necessary.

3. Quære, whether, upon a will emancipating slaves, the executor's assent to the bequest is necessary to perfect the right to freedom; and per TUCKER, P., it is so; and without such assent, no action at law can be maintained by the freedmen to recover freedom. S. C., 289

GAMING.

I. What the presentment must charge.

1. Presentment for gaming charges defendant with playing at unlawful game "at the house of R. L. in B. in the county of P. William:" Held, the presentment is fatally defective in not charging that the house where &c. was an ordinary or public place.

Hord v. Commonwealth, 674

II. Evidence.

2. Indictment for gaming charges defendant with unlawful playing with cards, to wit, at the game of all fours, of loo, and of whist, at a public place, to wit, at the store house of G. H. & Co: Held, that to convict the defendant, it is incumbent on the prosecutor to prove, that he played at some one of the games specified in the indictment, and that

3. If the playing was at the store house of G. H. & Co. in the night time, after the business of the day was at an end, and the doors closed, the store house in that state of things, prima facie, was not a public place, though it was so when it was open to the public in the day time.

Criminal jurisdiction.

1. If a question of law in a criminal prosecution

2. A circuit superior court, not adverting to the statute of 1832-3, ch. 19, § 2, sentences a convict to solitary confinement in the penitentiary for one sixth of the term of imprisonment fixed by the verdict; judgment reversed for this cause; but the general court proceeds to enter judgment, that the solitary confinement shall be one twelfth of the term, according to that statute.

Brooks v. Commonwealth, 669

INTEREST.

1. In covenant by M. against B. judgment is recovered by M. in 1792, for £2500. damages; fi. fa. is sued out by M. and returned nulla bona; then both parties die; and afterwards, the executor of B. makes sundry payments, at sundry times, to M.'s administrator: HELD, all such payments shall be applied to the principal of the debt due on the judgment; and M. is only entitled to the balance of principal with interest from the date of the judgment, and shall not be allowed to compute interest on the whole debt from date of the judgment, and apply the partial payments, first to the satisfaction of interest so computed, and then to the principal.

- Mercer's adm'r v. Beale &c., 189
Rate of interest.

2. It seems, that on the bequest of an annuity by will in 1791, while the legal rate of interest was only five per cent., though the annuity fall in arrear after interest was raised to six per cent., yet only five per cent. ought to be allowed on such arrears.

JEOFAILS.

I. Application of statute in civil cases.

1. In general, the statute of jefails is not applicable in case of a judgment by default for want of appearance; but if the party has once appeared, though he makes default afterwards, and then there is judgment against him by such default, the statute of jefails is applicable.

- Bargamin v. Poitiaux ex'or &c., 412

2. See Roe v. Baker, in note, 416

3. See Replevin No. 3, and Bargamin v. Poitiaux ex'or &c., 412

4. Indictment at common law, charging defendant with rescuing property that had been distrained by a sheriff for public dues, from a bailee to whose safe keeping the sheriff had committed it, without charging that the defendant knew in what right the bailee held it: HELD, indictment defective for not averring that the defendant had such knowledge. And this defect is not cured by verdict, by the statute of jefails in criminal cases. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 160, § 44.

- Commonwealth v. Israel, 675

5. Indictment on the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 30, for feloniously and fraudulently taking and removing a slave from one county to another, with intent to defraud the owner and deprive him of the property: HELD, fatally defective, after verdict, for want of an averment, that the slave was so taken and removed without the consent of the owner.

- Commonwealth v. Peas, 692

JUDGMENT.

I. Debt on judgment where record is destroyed.

1. D. recovered judgment against N. from which N. complained of error, regularly took an appeal; but before this appeal was or could be prosecuted, the office of the clerk of the court, and with it the record of the judgment, were destroyed by fire, and therefore the appeal was never prosecuted; then D. brought debt on the judgment whereof the record was so destroyed: HELD, he was entitled to recover, notwithstanding the appeal taken from the judgment, and the circumstances which prevented the prosecution thereof.

- Newcomb v. Drummond, 57

II. Limitation of remedy on judgment.

2. Quære, whether the provisions of the statute of 1792, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 138, § 17, apply to any case of a judgment recovered before the date of the enactment thereof? or whether it does not apply to every case of a judgment recovered against a decedent, whether before or after the enactment, in which his executor or administrator has qualified after the enactment? And per TUCKER, P., it applies to every case in which the qualification of the representative of the deceased debtor has been subsequent to the enactment, though the judgment *against the decedent may have been recovered before.

- Mercer's adm'r v. Beale &c., 189

3. Judgment recovered by D. P. & Co. against F. in September 1810, and execution sued out in the same month, and another in October 1815, but neither returned; to a scire facias to revive the judgment against F.'s ex'or, sued out in July 1826, defendant pleads in bar, the statute of limitations, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 5.—plaintiffs reply the two executions sued out in September 1810, and October 1815; on demurrer to this replication, HELD, the statute is a bar to the scire facias.

- Fleming's ex'or v. Dunlop & Buchanan &c., 338

4. But it seems, by the opinion of TUCKER, P., that debt would lie on the judgment, and the statute would not be a bar to that action. S. C., 338

JURORS.

I. Constitution of grand jury.

1. On first day of term of a circuit superior court, a grand jury is impaneled and sworn, and proceeds in discharge of its duties; but next day, it is discovered that one of the grand jurors wants legal qualification; upon which the court discharges him, and orders another to be sworn in his place. HELD, this was regular, and the grand jury duly constituted.
Commonwealth v. Burton, 645

2. It seems, that one who has contracted by articles under seal to sell his land, but has not yet conveyed it by deed, and therefore still holds the legal title, is a freeholder qualified to serve on a grand jury.

JUSTICES OF PEACE.

Disqualification.

By the statute of 1821-2, ch. 26, if a justice of the peace is appointed to and accepts an office under the government of the U. States or any other incompatible office, he thereby vacates his office of justice of the peace; his resignation of the incompatible office will not restore him to the office of justice of the peace; nor can he ever lawfully exercise this office, without a new commission.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

In assumpsit for the use and occupation of a farm for a year, it appears, that the landlord entered on a meadow, parcel of the premises, within the year, and mowed and carried away the hay, without the consent and against the will of the tenant; who, nevertheless, continued to occupy the farm during the residue of the year: HELD, the landlord, by 717 such disturbance of the tenant, lost "the benefit of the intire contract, and is not entitled to recover any part of the rent."
Briggs v. Hall, 484

LARCENY.

What amounts to larceny.

If a person obtain possession of a watch from the owner, by a false and fraudulent pretense of buying it for cash, and then carry it away without the consent or knowledge of the owner, he is yet not guilty of larceny, unless it was with a felonious intent that he so obtained possession of the watch and carried it away.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. Contracts to locate a treasury warrant on lands in Kentucky, is made in August 1782; and it appeared, the breach, if any, must have occurred before the erection of Kentucky into a separate state: HELD, the act of limitations of Virginia began to run from the time of the breach, and was, therefore, a bar to an action on the contract brought in 1816.

MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT.

What interest is subject to husband's debts.

1. By deed of marriage settlement, slaves of the feme are conveyed to a trustee, in trust to permit the husband to take the profits during the joint lives of himself and his wife; remainder, if the husband should first die, to the wife; and if she should first die, to such persons as she should appoint; with an express declaration, that the property should not be subject to the husband's debts: HELD, the husband's interest in the profits during the joint lives of himself and his wife, is subject to his debts; and provision should be made for satisfaction of a creditor, by hiring the slaves out, or otherwise, as most convenient.

- I. When mortgagor's wife need not join in deed.
1. When mortgage by vendee will be deemed part of same transaction with conveyance by vendor. See Dower No. 1, and Gilliam v. Mobre, 30

II. What instruments must be recorded.

2. L. executes a bill of sale of a slave to B. which bill of sale, though absolute on its face, was in fact intended as a mortgage; the bill of sale, though intended as a mortgage, was never recorded; and possession of the slave was never delivered to or acquired by the vendee, and could not be at the time the deed was executed, the slave being then a runaway; but the vendor afterwards got possession of him, without the knowledge or consent of the vendee; and then sold him to C. a fair purchaser, for valuable consideration, without notice of the previous bill of sale to B. HELD, that the bill of sale from L. to B. must be taken for what it was intended to be, a mortgage, which was void as against the subsequent fair purchaser, because it was not recorded according to the statute of conveyances, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 4. Bird v. Wilkinson, 266

III. When mortgagee may call for legal title, as against a purchaser.

3. By written articles, Head contracts to sell to Benjamin De Baptist, a lot of land, for bricks to be furnished and laid by vendee in walls of a house to be built for vendor; vendee, unable to perform the contract, transfers it, before work begun, to John and William De Baptist, with Head's consent; John and William borrow $500 of Beck, and give him a deed of trust of the lot to secure the payment; then, John and William furnish the bricks and do the work for Head, according to the contract; but afterwards Benjamin sells the same lot to Edward De Baptist, and he sells it to Long, and Benjamin, Edward, John and William all join in conveyance to Long, all the parties having actual notice of Beck's deed of trust; and then Long sells it to Adams who has no notice of the deed of trust;—the legal title having been retained by Head, as security for performance of the contract on part of vendee, and still remaining in him: HELD, that Beck has the best right to call for the legal title, and to subject the property to the payment of the $500 secured to him by the deed of trust, if that deed was duly recorded before Adams's purchase, otherwise not. Beck's adm'r v. De Baptists and others, 349

IV. Priority of lien.

4. Mortgage of leasehold property, to secure to Bank of Virginia the contents of a note discounted for mortgagor's accommodation, with stipulation that the note shall be renewed only till a certain time; and then same subject is mortgaged to Farmers Bank, to secure a debt to it; the Bank of Virginia renews the note for three years after time stipulated; HELD, such prolonged renewals of the note were only an extension of credit for the same debt, which no wise impaired the lien of the first mortgage, and the Bank of Virginia has priority over the Farmers Bank. Farmers Bank v. Mut. Ass. Society &c., 69

5. See Capias ad satisfaciendum, and Rogers and brothers v. Marshall &c., 425

V. Mortgagee's liability to covenants in lease.

MULTIPLICITY OF SUITS.

- In a suit in the county court in chancery between the heirs of a decedent, the court decrees, that a mill, whereof partition can no otherwise be made, shall be sold by commissioners on a credit of twelve months; the commissioners make the sale and report it; the court, after the twelve months elapsed, confirm the report, and order the commissioners to convey to the purchaser; then, a conveyance is tendered to the purchaser, who refuses to complete the purchase, the mill having been carried away by a fresh within the twelve months; and while the cause is yet pending in the county court, the heirs exhibit a bill in the superior court of chancery against the purchaser for specific execution: HELD, that as the cause in the county court was still pending, this bill in the superior court could not be entertained.

MUTUAL ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

If buildings insured in the Mut. Ass. Society against fire &c. be mortgaged, the policy of assurance is ipso facto assigned to the mortgagee.

NEGOTIABLE NOTE.

1. In debt on promissory note, by indorsee against maker, the declaration states the note as one made negotiable at the bank of V. and avers, that the note at maturity was duly presented at the bank, and protested for non-payment; the note offered in evidence, was made negotiable at bank; and there was no proof that it was presented at bank for payment: HELD, a note made negotiable at bank, is not therefore payable there also, and so the averment of presentation at bank was wholly immaterial, and need not be proved. Barrett v. Wills, 114

2. Quære, whether, in the case of a note made payable at a particular bank, it is necessary, in an action on it against the maker, to aver and prove due presentation of the note for payment, at the bank? S. C., 114

NEW TRIAL.

1. Whenever a bill of exceptions to an instruction of the court to a jury, on the trial of an issue, is so vague and imperfect, that the appellate court cannot ascertain the exact state of the case, nor consequently the import and effect of the instruction, it is the settled practice, to reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and remand the cause for a new trial. Bowyer v. Chestnut, 1

2. If a special verdict be uncertain, so that the court cannot say for which party judgment ought to be given, there ought to be a venire de novo; but if the verdict be not uncertain, but the plaintiff's case thereby shewn to be a defective case, or a defective title, there should be no venire de novo, and judgment must be given for the defendant. Brown & Sons v. Ferguson, 37

3. A new trial ought never to be granted, where it appears that the party asking it has had a fair trial on the real merits of the case, and that justice has been done. Goode v. Love's adm'rs, 635

NUISANCE.

When equity will injoin.

A mill and mill dam are erected in 1815, by leave of court, according to the statute concerning mills &c.; the stagnation of the water in the mill pond proves injurious to the health of the neighbourhood; and one of the neighbours, thereby injured, brings an action against the mill owners, and recovers damages at law; about the time of this recovery, the mill dam is carried away, and the pond drained; and the mill owners, after the recovery, are proceeding to rebuild the mill dam, proposing certain expedients to prevent the stagnation of the waters from being again injurious to the health of the neighborhood: HELD, a court of chancery, upon a bill by the person who recovered the judgment at law against the mill owners, may and ought to interfere, and join them from rebuilding the dam, unless it shall appear that the expedients proposed by the mill owners will be effectual to prevent the mischief in future, which ought to be ascertained by a jury upon an issue directed for the purpose.

Indulgence by creditor to principal.

3. A creditor suspends execution on a forthcoming bond for several years, but he does so without consideration, and he nowise binds himself to suspend execution for any definite time: the principal and all the sureties but one become insolvent; and then the creditor sues out execution against the solvent surety: HELD, the surety is not entitled to relief in equity.

- Aicock v. Hill, 622
4. The principles stated, on which indulgence given by creditor to principal, exonerates the surety, S. C., 622

Execution after injunction by principal alone.

5. Execution is awarded on a forthcoming bond against the principal and the surety therein bound: the principal alone obtains an injunction to stay proceedings at law, which injunction is dissolved: HELD, the surety is not liable for the damages incurred by the principal for retarding the execution by an injunction; and if an execution issue against the surety as well as principal for such damages, it ought, on the surety's motion, to be quashed. The execution should be so moulded, as to exempt the surety from the damages, and to make the principal who incurred them alone liable therefor.

RAPE.

Attempt by coloured man on white female.

1. Upon an indictment on statute of 1822-3, ch. 34, § 3. It is found, that a free negro, not intending to have carnal knowledge of a white woman by force, but intending to have such knowledge of her while she was asleep, got into bed with her, and pulled up her night garment, which waked her, using no other force: HELD, this was not an attempt to ravish, within the meaning of the statute.

- Commonwealth v. Fields, 648
2. A white girl under twelve years of age, and not having attained to puberty, is a white woman, within the meaning of the statute making it felony punishable with death, for a slave, free negro or mulatto, to attempt to ravish a white woman.
Commonwealth v. Watts, 672

RECOGNIZANCE.

1. A debt due by recognizance of special bail, is of higher dignity than a debt due by specialty, and shall have preference accordingly, in the administration of the assets of a decedent.

REFUNDING BOND.

When slaves emancipated by will are set free by the executor, he is not entitled to a refunding bond to indemnify him against the claims of the testator's creditors, though the manumitted slaves are, notwithstanding manumission, subject to debts.

- Elder v. Elder's ex'or, 252

REGISTRY OF DEEDS.

1. A deed dated in April 1804, and the execution thereof attested by witnesses, is not recorded within eight months from its date: but, in April 1805, the grantor acknowledges the deed in open court, and upon such acknowledgment it is ordered to be recorded: HELD, upon the construction of the statute of conveyances of 1792, 1 Old Rev. Code, ch. 90, § 1, 4, such acknowledgment of the deed in court, is to be taken as a redelivery and reexecution of the deed, so as to make it a deed as of the date of such acknowledgment, and so the deed is well recorded within eight months from the time of the execution, and is valid as against the grantor's creditors.

REPLEVIN.

Nonsuit of tenant plaintiff.

1. In replevin, defendant makes avowry for rent due him from plaintiff, and then plaintiff, failing to appear and plead, is nonsuit: HELD, if it is proper, in such case, to award a writ of inquiry to ascertain avowant's damages, under the 23rd section of the general statute of rents, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113.

- Bargamin v. Poltiaux ex'or &c., 412
2. In such case, too, the avowry is to be considered as only a suggestion, and though it be faulty as an avowry, in not shewing the landlord's title, yet as a suggestion, it is good and sufficient. S. C., 412

3. In such case, moreover, the statute of jeofails would be applicable to cure all defects in the avowry. S. C., 412

RESCUE.

1. Indictment at common law, charging defendant with rescuing property that had been distrained by a sheriff for public dues, from a bailee to whose safe keeping the sheriff had committed it, without charging that the defendant knew in what right the bailee held it: HELD, indictment defective for not averring that the defendant had such knowledge.

- Commonwealth v. Israel, 67
2. And this defect is not cured by verdict, by the statute of jeofails in criminal cases, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 44. S. C., 675

RESTITUTION.

Where execution has been levied and returned satisfied, on judgment which is erroneous and afterwards reversed or corrected, restitution cannot be awarded, unless it appear that the money has been paid to plaintiff.

SHERIFFS AND SERGEANTS.

- I. Action against sheriff for taking insufficient bail, or defective bail bond.
1. On a capias ad respondendum, on which appearance bail is required, the sheriff takes insufficient bail, but the plaintiff proceeds against the bail, and recovers judgment against him as well as the principal, without objecting to the sufficiency of the bail, at the rules or in court, at or before the first term after the return day of the writ, or at any time pending the suit: HELD, the plaintiff cannot afterwards maintain an action against the sheriff for taking insufficient bail.
A bail bond is executed by the principal and the bail, though the name of the bail is not inserted in the body of the bond (there being a blank left for his name) which, in other respects, is a regular bail bond, and the plaintiff proceeds on the bond and recovers judgment against the bail as well as principal, and this judgment stands unreversed: HELD, 1. this is the bond of the bail, though his name is not inserted in the body of it; and 2. if it were a defective bond, the plaintiff having a judgment on the bond against the bail, could not maintain an action against the sheriff for returning a defective bail bond.

SLAVES.

1. Concerning the validity of a contract made by the agency of a slave, see Contract No. 6. and Gore v. Buzzard's adm'rs, 231
2. In every case in which the owner of slaves wrongfully taken in execution for the debt of another, applies to a court of equity to inhibit the sale of them, the court ought to award an injunction, and if the case be made out, to give relief, though it be neither alleged in the bill, nor proved, that the slaves have any peculiar value.

4. Indictment on the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 11, § 30, for feloniously and fraudulently taking and removing a slave from one county to another, with intent to defraud the owner and deprive him of the property: HELD, fatally defective, after verdict, for want of an averment that the slave was so taken and removed without the consent of the owner.
Commonwealth v. Peas, 692
5. See Emancipation and Freedom.

SLAVES. FREE NEGROES AND MULATTOES.

Criminal proceedings against them.

1. See Rape, and
Commonwealth v. Fields, 648
Commonwealth v. Watts, 672
2. Upon the construction of the statute of 1831-2, ch. 22, § 11, free negroes and mulattoes are to be tried by the county courts of oyer and terminer, in the same manner in which slaves are tried. In all cases of felony, except homicide and such crimes as, if committed by free negroes or mulattoes, where, by the laws existing before this statute, punishable with death; and for homicide and such crimes as, if committed by free negroes or mulattoes, where so punishable with death, they are still to be tried by jury in the circuit superiour courts.
Commonwealth v. Weldon, 653
- 725 *3. In cases of felonies committed by free negroes or mulattoes, other than homicide and capital crimes, the statute changes the manner of trial and the tribunal for the trial, but not the punishment which previous laws inflicted on free negroes or mulattoes for such crimes; and the county court of oyer and terminer convicting such a person of such a crime, may and must sentence the convict to imprisonment in the penitentiary, if that be the punishment prescribed by previous laws.
S. C., 652

See Bail.

SPECIAL VERDICT.

1. If a special verdict be uncertain, so that the court cannot say for which party judgment ought to be given, there ought to be a venire de novo; but if the verdict be not uncertain, but the plaintiff's case thereby shewn be a defective case, or a defective title, there should be no venire de novo, and judgment must be given for the defendant.

SPECIFIC EXECUTION.

1. A house and lot in town is advertised for sale at auction, and the lot described as containing nearly two acres; the auctioneer at the sale states that there is nearly two acres, but points to the enclosure of the lot as containing the land he proposes to sell; and it appears to have been a sale in gross; the lot, in fact, contains only one acre and twelve poles; upon a bill for specific execution, by vendor against vendee, HELD, specific execution rightly decreed; and the purchaser is not entitled to any abatement in the price for such deficiency.

TRESPASS.

1. Trespass quare clausum fregit. See Demurrer to evidence No. 1, and

Construction of statute punishing wilful trespass.

2. Quære, whether the taking of any property other than such as is ejusdem generis with that specially mentioned in the statute of 1822-3, ch. 34, § 1, for punishing wilful trespasses, be within the meaning of the statute?

Commonwealth v. Israel,

3. Upon an indictment on the statute of 1822-3, ch. 34, § 1, the jury find, in a special verdict, that defendant shot and killed hogs the property of another, the hogs being on defendant's own land at the time of his shooting and killing them: HELD, the verdict is defective and insufficient, in not finding the essential ingredients required by the statute to constitute the misdemeanour, viz. that defendant killed the hogs "knowingly and wilfully without lawful authority."

Commonwealth v. Percavil,

4. The provisions of that statute are not confined to property ejusdem generis with that specially there enumerated; and the circumstance of the property destroyed being at the time on defendant's own land, does not take the case out of the statute.

5. An indictment on that statute, for taking away property, must allege that the property taken away by the defendant belonged to another person; and that the taking was "knowingly and wilfully without lawful authority." In the terms of the statute.

2. J. M. by deed conveys land and slaves and personally to W. F. in trust, *for the support and maintenance of J. M. and L. his wife, and their children and family during the joint lives of J. M. and his wife, and the life of the longest liver of them, remainder to their children, with full power to the trustee to manage the estate, and to sell any part of the trust subject to pay the debts of J. M. then due; J. M. in the space of seven months contracts a debt to merchants for goods furnished to an amount equal to whole yearly profits of trust estate: HELD, that the trustee could not pledge the prospective profits of the trust estate necessary for the current support of the cestui que trust, to such a debt, if contracted even by the trustee himself, for their past support; much more the debts contracted by one of the cestui que trust without the trustee's consent or knowledge.

Markham v. Guerrant & Watkins,

Power of chancery.

3. Such debt contracted by J. M. cannot be properly charged by a court of chancery on the prospective profits of the estate, so as to bereave J. M.'s wife and children of support.

S. C.,

A private unchartered company, associated for the purpose of carrying on business as a bank, though such associations are contrary to law, shall be entertained in a court of chancery, in a suit against its cashier, for an account of his agency.

Berkshire v. Evans et al.,

USE AND OCCUPATION.

In assumpsit for the use and occupation of a farm for a year, it appears, that the landlord entered on a meadow, parcel of the premises, within the year, and mowed and carried away the hay, without the consent and against the will of the tenant, who, nevertheless, continued to occupy the farm during the residue of the year. Held, the landlord, by such disturbance of the tenant, lost the benefit of the entire contract, and is not entitled to recover any part of the rent.

Briggs v. Hall, 484

USURY.

S. and N. being indebted to the F. and M. bank, and the bank having recovered judgments against them for the debts, and the debtors then applying to the bank for indulgence, the bank agrees to give them a long indulgence, upon their agreeing to give real security for the debt, and moreover to pay the attorney of the bank all the costs of the suits, and the commission which the bank had agreed to pay him for collecting and securing the debt; the debtors give the real security for the debt; and one of them pays the costs and part of the commission to the attorney, and his executor gives the attorney his note for the balance of the commission; the attorney having full notice of the terms of the agreement between the bank and the debtors: Held, the agreement between the bank and the debtors, and therefore the note for the commission to the attorney, were usurious.

Toole v. Stephen, 581

Between declaration and proof.

1. In assumpsit, plaintiff declares that defendant contracted to locate a treasury warrant for plaintiff on waste and unappropriated lands, and to cause the same to be surveyed and patented, and alleges a breach, that defendant did not cause lands by him located on the warrant to be surveyed and patented; but at the trial, plaintiff proves a contract whereby defendant did not undertake to cause the land to be patented as well as located and surveyed; on demurrer to evidence, Held, the evidence does not prove the contract laid in the declaration, and plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

M'Alexander v. Montgomery, 61

2. In debt on an injunction bond, the declaration, in assigning breach, alleges that the injunction was dissolved by the superiour court of chancery; plea, conditions performed: at trial, plaintiff offers the record of the injunction cause in evidence, 780 whereby it appears the injunction was awarded by the county court in August 1814, dissolved in July 1820, and bill dismissed in September 1820; and in November 1820 leave was given to the plaintiff in equity to reinstate the injunction, and amend the bill, and the amended bill was filed and answered; afterwards, the cause is removed by certiorari to the superiour court of chancery, which dissolved the injunction awarded by the county court in August 1814, not that awarded in November 1820—and an objection being taken to the record as evidence, on the ground that the injunction awarded in August 1814, has been finally and conclusively dissolved by the county court, and so was not and could not be dissolved by the superiour court, and, therefore, that there was a variance between the record offered in evidence, and the allegation of the breach in the declaration, the objection was overruled, and the record admitted in evidence. Held, the record was properly admitted in evidence.

VENUE.

Change of venue in criminal case.

Indictment for felony in the circuit court of Warwick: the court for good cause sends the case to the circuit court of York, to be tried at the term of that court to be held on the 8th June 1831; the circuit court of York, doubting its competency to try the case at that term, which was a special one, continued it till the next regular term of the circuit superiour court of York; and the prisoner is afterwards tried there, and convicted: Held, the circuit court of Warwick had no power to direct the case to be tried at any particular term of the circuit court of York; but the direction that the case should be tried at the June term 1831, is to be rejected as surplusage: the substance of the order is a change of the venue from Warwick to York.

3. An administrator makes sales of slaves of his intestate, to raise funds for payment of debts, but it turns out that the funds are not wanted to pay debts; and upon a question, what interest the intestate's widow is entitled to in the proceeds of the slaves so sold: Held, that, as the widow was entitled to only a life interest in one-third of the slaves, the best general practical rule is, to give her one-third of the proceeds of sale thereof for her life, requiring bond with surety of her, that the principal, at her death, shall be paid to the persons, entitled in remainder.

WILLS.

Construction of will.

1. Testator devises the residue of his real estate to his daughter L. B. and her husband J. B. during the life of the longest liver of them, and then to their offspring if any by his daughter L. B. as they shall think best to give it; and, in default of such offspring, to M. B.'s and N. A.'s offspring, if they have any, and as they think best to dispose to their offspring; and if they have none, then to the poor of E. R. parish—at the date of the will, the testator's daughter L. B. had offspring by her husband J. B.—the daughter died before the testator; her offspring survived him, and died in infancy, living their

2. Quære, how far, in determining what is an estate tail on which the statute for abolishing entails shall operate, the statute which dispenses with the necessity of words, of inheritance in deeds or wills, to give an estate of inheritance, may affect the construction of the grant or devise?

3. Testator devises real and personal estate to his natural daughter P. A. to her and her heirs forever; and if she should die leaving no child, the estate before given should return into his estate, and be divided among his legitimate children; but should she leave a living child or children, then the estate should be held by him, her or them, as the case might be: HELD, P. A. took by the will an estate tail in the lands devised to her, which the statute for abolishing entails converted into a fee simple, and barred the contingent remainder limited on the estate tail.

The devisee P. A. having left illegitimate children living at her death, capable of inheriting and of transmitting inheritance on the part of their mother, in like manner as if they had been her lawful children, by the provision of the statute of descents, 1 Rev. Thomason v. Andersons, 118

4. Testator devises land to his son William and his heirs, and if he should die without a son and not sell the land, then to testator's son George: HELD, the devise gave William absolute power to sell the fee simple; and therefore, whether he sold it or not, he took a fee simple, and the devise over to George was void.

Melson v. Cooper, 408

5. Testator directs, that his executors shall be handsomely paid out of his estate for the trouble they shall be at in the charging that trust; it appears, that there is no extraordinary trouble in the administration: HELD, nothing shall be allowed beyond the usual commission of five per cent.

Waddy's ex'or v. Hawkins's adm'r, 458

6. A testator having devised and bequeathed real and personal property to his daughter, directs, that she shall have a good education, and live in a respectable family, and authorizes his executor to use part of the principal of the estate given her, if the income be not sufficient to carry that his purpose into effect; the daughter being at the time under fourteen years of age: Quære, whether this amounts to the appointment of the executor testamentary guardian of the infant daughter?
